How they celebrated the Nazis' demise!

What euphoria and elation must have accompanied the news that the war in Europe was over. War would still rage in the Pacific for another five months, but the Nazi scourge was finally vanquished. For almost six years, Canada had been at war, and now its soldiers would be coming home.

Sixty years ago, on May 7 at 2:41 a.m. at General Allied Headquarters in Rheims, France, Gen. Alfred Jodl, the representative of the German High Command, and Grand Admiral Karl Doenitz, the designated head of the German state, signed the act of unconditional surrender of all German land, sea and air forces in Europe to the Allied Expeditionary Force and simultaneously to the Soviet High Command.

British Prime Minister Winston Churchill announced the news of the surrender to his countrymen and to the entire world the following day by radio broadcast at 3 p.m.

"The German war is at an end, "he said in his famously stentorian voice. "After years of intense preparation, Germany hurled herself on Poland at the beginning of September 1939, and in pursuance of our guarantee to Poland... [we] declared war upon this foul aggressor. After gallant France had been struck down, we, from this island and from our united empire, maintained the struggle single-handed for a whole year until we were joined by the military might of Soviet Russia and later by the overwhelming power and resources of the United States of America.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Rabbi's Son Killed

TORONTO — The 22-year-old son of Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council of Canada, died April 22 of head and back injuries from a late-night car accident involving a vehicle that was apparently fleeing Toronto police. Nesanel Levin, who was reportedly visiting for Passover on a break from yeshiva studies in Israel, was driving a Honda Civic at about 11:15 p.m. on April 19 when he was hit on Bathurst Street south of Wilson Avenue by a Plymouth Breeze. The Plymouth was being followed by police as a suspect car after a break-in on nearby Carmichael Avenue, Ontario's Special Investigations Unit said. The 55-year-old driver was not seriously injured.

Endowment Launched

OTTAWA — The Ottawa Jewish community began an endowment fundraising campaign last month with the announcement that it has already raised $15 million toward its $40-million goal. The aim is to use the interest from the endowment to fund community agencies and needs, campaign co-chair Irving Taylor told the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin. The campaign was launched April 11 at the home of Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker and closes July 31.

WORLD

Profs Boycott Schools

LONDON — A union of British university teachers has launched a boycott of Haifa and Bar-Ilan universities. The Association of University Teachers voted to suspend all links with Haifa and Bar-Ilan and to circulate a statement to members from Palestinian groups calling for a full-scale boycott of Israeli academics. Haifa University was accused of victimizing anti-Zionist lecturer Ilan Pappe, and Bar-Ilan was charged with aiding a college in a West Bank settlement. The decision was immediately condemned by Jewish and academic groups. After Pappe voiced support for the boycott, Haifa University's president asked him to resign.

Pesach Fire Kills Three

NEW YORK — Three Jewish boys in the chassidic enclave of Williamsburg in Brooklyn died when a fire on the first day of Passover ripped through their apartment. The Sunday fire began in the kitchen, where two stove burners for warming food had been left on since Friday because of halachic prohibitions against lighting or putting out flames on Shabbat and festivals. The dead boys are brothers Shyia and Yidal Matyas, 13 and 15, and their nephew Shlomi Falkowitz, 7.

Liberations Recalled

PARIS — French President Jacques Chirac addressed a April 24 ceremony in Paris attended by more than 2,000 Holocaust survivors to mark 60 years since the liberation of Nazi concentration camps. "We have not forgotten, and we will never forget" the events of the Shoah, he said. "They are engraved in letters of blood and tears on our history. They trace our duty for us."

Aussie Shul Attacked

SYDNEY — A rural white extremist group is believed responsible for an attack on a synagogue in Newcastle, Australia, a city 100 miles north of Sydney with a Jewish community of about 30. The April 20 attack took place on the 116th anniversary of Adolf Hitler's birth. The shul's walls were daubed with swastikas and stickers with virulently anti-Semitic slogans, and its six stained glass windows were destroyed. The same week, a household in a small nearby town flew a Nazi flag, but its residents said they bought it in a market and didn't know what it symbolized. They finally took it down after pressure from local politicians, national media and Jewish groups.

Reporter Honoured

LONDON — Britain last week honoured a BBC reporter accused of anti-Israel bias. Irish-born war correspondent Orla Guerin, who has most recently been based in Jerusalem, was named a Member of the British Empire. The move angered Israeli officials, who say her coverage favours the Palestinians and fosters anti-Semitism abroad.

Partisan Bunker Tour

SAN FRANCISCO — A new website will allow visitors to have a three-dimensional tour of a virtual zemlyanka, an underground bunker where some of the estimated 30,000 Jewish resistance fighters in eastern Europe lived during the Shoah. The exhibit at www.jewishpartisans.org, run by the San Francisco-based Jewish Partisan Educational Foundation, has been up since late April.

Say No to Sanctions, Jews Urge Protestants

NEW YORK — Jewish groups are urging Protestant churches not to press sanctions against Israel.

The Jewish groups signed a letter April 22 to the Episcopal Church, Evangelical Lutheran Church of America, the National Council of Churches, Presbyterian Church (USA), United Church of Christ and United Methodist Church, asking that they not endorse calls for economic and political sanctions against Israel, as several Protestant groups have done.

The letter came after word the United Church of Christ and United Methodist Church were reportedly set to announce they would be considering sanctions in the next few months.

"At this fragile time in the Middle East peace negotiations, all who seek peace should be focused on continued economic and political engagement, and what can be done to support efforts to peace and confidence building," the letter said. "We call on our Christian colleagues to reject all negative economic and political sanctions, for they undermine peace, foster prejudice and give hope to extremists on every side."

Signatories to the letter included the Anti-Defamation League, the American Jewish Committee, the American Jewish Congress, the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, the Orthodox Union, the Union for Reform Judaism and the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

Complaints dismissed against two religious schools

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

A project glorifying violence against Israel, written by a student at Ottawa's Islamic Abraar School, was an isolated incident, education minister Gerard Kennedy announced last week.

At the same time, Kennedy said the province will not act on a complaint from the Canadian Islamic Congress after a Jewish student at an afternoon synagogue school in Kingston wrote that Palestinians in 1948 wanted "to push the Israelis into the sea."

The ministry considers the afternoon Talmud Torah classes at Kingston's Beth Israel Congregation outside its purview because it's an afternoon congregational school.

"It's not within our jurisdiction," spokesperson Amanda Alvaro told The CJN, adding the ministry won't investigate the Islamic congress' complaint.

Only the day before, Kennedy announced he would look into the complaint, even though he had not received a formal request from the Islamic group. "We do think that the government has to uphold certain kinds of standards, especially when children are involved," he said.

But the next day, upon learning the student in question attended Hebrew classes at a congregational school, the minister said there would be no follow-up.

The Islamic congress called for the probe after a letter was published in the Kingston Whig-Standard on March 17. The letter, from nine-year-old Jacob Kaplan, a student at the synagogue's twice-weekly Hebrew school, was in response to a March 1 letter from Kingston resident Joseph Backus.

Backus blamed the lack of progress in Middle East peace squarely on Israel and its "war leader," who will continue building "Jewish-only settlements at a rapid pace on Palestinian land, and will continue building the apartheid separation barrier that will annex even more land to Israel and mark out the border of the Palestinian reservation or ghetto."

In his response, Jacob said he learned at his Hebrew school that Israel "does not want to fight… Jews have been trying to protect themselves in the land since Israel became a state in 1948. The reason there is war is because when the British divided the state, the Palestinians wanted more and invaded, wanting to push the Israelis into the sea."

However, in its complaint to the education ministry and in public statements, the Canadian Islamic Congress quoted Jacob's letter as saying Palestinians "want only to push the Israelis into the sea."

In an earlier statement, Valiante said "the teaching that influenced the child's letter" is "damaging to healthy relationships among many Canadians in our multicultural and pluralistic society."

She said the congress hoped the government would treat the case with the "same care and speed" it showed after the complaint about racist remarks in a student's report at the private Abraar school in Ottawa. The congress said Jacob's letter was "comparable" to what took place there.

Jacob Kaplan's father, Barry, told The CJN he's "not interested in pursuing this any more. We've made our point, I think."

In an interview with the Whig-Standard, Kaplan said his son "took it upon himself to draft a response, and Bonnie [Jacob's mother] and I are very proud of him for his willingness to stand up for something he believes in.

"I think the writing that is contained in his letter is a good representation of what has happened historically," he said.

"Maybe the phrase 'Push into the sea' is a bit strong, but it's not inaccurate."

Kaplan said Jacob was concerned about the controversy surrounding his letter, and had been warned by his parents that his views may be unpopular.

Keep their memories alive

It's hard to know exactly what to do to commemorate Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah. But we know that we must do something.

It's harder still to know what to say to convey one's thoughts and one's feelings about Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah. But here we know there is room for silence. For, as Elie Wiesel and so many others have often wondered, perhaps silence is the only truly human response to the abomination that we call the Shoah.

But, as individuals and as a people, we also know that we must always differentiate the personal response from the communal one. Whereas silence may be appropriate for an individual, silence is never appropriate for a community.

Thus, on the 27th day of Nissan, the day set aside by proclamation of the Knesset to mark the destruction of European Jewry and the heroism of the resisters, Jews all around the world come together as communities to publicly remember what must never be forgotten.

There remain, of course, legitimate questions about how to remember. Individuals and communities find their own paths into the hallowed, but often emotionally shattered, hall of memory.

Two years ago, the Rabbinical Assembly published Megillat Hashoah, the Shoah Scroll, a profoundly moving, elegiac, searing document that aims, as far as is humanly possible, to help express the cry from the heart, the cri de coeur, for all of us struggling to find our own ways into the hall.

"The publication of Megillat Hashoah marks a milestone in the transformation of Yom Hashoah into a a sacred day within the cycle of the Jewish year, taking its rightful place as a day of mourning and religious commemoration," wrote Rabbi Reuven Hammer, the president of the assembly, in Jerusalem two years ago when the megillah was introduced.

The Rabbinical Assembly document is actually more than the megillah, the scroll, itself. It provides an entire liturgy for Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah.

The scroll was written in concise, modern Hebrew by Avigdor Shinan and translated by Jules Harlow. It comprises six chapters: In the Beginning; The Earth is filled with Chaos and Confusion; The Darkness Spread Over All; Confronting the Abyss; A Heavenly Voice, Hovering, Cries Out; and Let There be Light Again.

The writing is modest. It never overreaches. It never substitutes artifice for narrative. It speaks with heartbreaking understatement. Nor does the scroll try to sound "biblical." Rather, it sounds as it must – namely, like a testimony.

That the testimony is delivered in Hebrew is more than a liturgical necessity. Hebrew is both the old and the new language of the Jewish people, the language of our sacred texts and the language of the State of Israel.The Hebrew of the megillah poignantly conveys the inherent Jewishness of the events described in the testimonies.

The translations from the Hebrew are superb, but inevitably they fall short of the melodic movement and alliterative flow so inherently unique to the sounds of Hebrew.

The writing of the megillah began as an idea expressed some years ago by Alex Eisen, a survivor himself, to Rabbi Philip Scheim in Toronto.

That conversation led ultimately to the writing of the scroll, a joint labour by many individuals at the Rabbinical Assembly and at the Schechter Institute in Jerusalem. It was under the guidance of Rabbi David Golinkin, president of the Schechter Institute, that the final document came to be written.

This year, an all-Hebrew edition and a Hebrew-French edition of the megillah have been published. The megillah will be read in synagogues and homes in England and France.

The book in which the megillah is published also features a special Yizkor written by Abba Kovner, as well as the now timeless poems Undzer Shtetl Brent (Our shtetl is burning) by Mordechai Gebertig and Zog Nit Keyn Mol (the Partisans' song) by Hirsh Glick, and three introductory essays by rabbis Hammer, Golinkin and Scheim.

As Rabbi Scheim expressed, it is the hope of its compilers that Megillat Hashoah will be read on Yom Hashoah every year in synagogues and communities throughout the world."

Rabbi Hammer succinctly and eloquently explains why. "With the publication of Megillat Hashoah, we express the depth of our mourning of our brothers and sisters who were destroyed in this terrible Holocaust. We pledge ourselves to keep their memories alive forever and to dedicate ourselves to the proposition that Am Yisrael Hai – we shall continue to live and to proclaim the greatness of the Jewish people and its way of life."

Megillat Hashoah should be read by all. It can help us arrive at the hall of memory. It's available through the United Synagogue Book Service by calling 1-800-594-5617, or at booksvc@uscj.org.

PUTIN VISITS ISRAEL: Russian President Vladamir Putin, left centre, met with Israeli President Moshe Katsav, right, at the presidential residence during his visit to Israel last week. Putin is the first Russian or former Soviet Union leader to visit Israel while in power. He also met with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and visited the new Yad Vashem Holocaust museum. Putin told Sharon that while he is in power he would not do anything to harm Israel. He also told Sharon that he is concerned, just as Israel is, with the thought of a nuclear-armed Iran. See story, page 40.

Israeli rabbi a proponent of non-violent protest

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Shlomo Aviner says he is not a lone voice among Orthodox Jewish Israelis or even among most of the settlers when he exhorts IDF soldiers not to disobey evacuation orders during this summer's planned disengagement from Gaza.

"Mutiny is something bad. We need our army. Our army is not dealing only with disengagement. Our army is protecting our land," he said in an interview at the offices of Mizrachi Canada.

The quiet-spoken rabbi – who was born in 1943 in German-occupied Lyon, France, and served in the IDF during both the Six-Day War and the Yom Kippur War – was in Toronto recently to speak at Congregation B'nai Torah and meet with supporters of his Jerusalem-based yeshiva, Ateret Cohanim. He also spoke at Toronto's Bnei Akiva high schools, Yeshivat Or Chaim and its sister high school for girls, Ulpanat Orot.

Rabbi Aviner, rosh yeshiva of Yeshivat Ateret Cohanim in Jerusalem and rabbi of the community of Beit El, is an electrical engineer by training and has a master's degree in mathematics. But, he said, after he made aliyah in 1966, he decided he could make a greater contribution by focusing on "spiritual edification."

A disciple of Rabbi Tzvi Yehuda Kook, son of Israel's first chief rabbi, Rabbi Aviner is a prolific author who is well known in Israel. He grew up in the religious Zionist movement, eventually serving as national director of Bnei Akiva in France.

Rabbi Aviner's public pronouncements on disengagement in no way indicate approval of it. He said settlers should continue to struggle against disengagement, but "without violence, without insults, without hatred and – the most important thing – to convince the Jewish people in Israel that this is a very grave mistake. It's a human mistake, a national mistake, a religious mistake, a strategic mistake and a security mistake.

"We hope it will be possible to stop this process, but generally, everything we do in our state we have to do together. It's the most important thing."

Nor is he in favour of the establishment of a Palestinian state. "The Palestinians have a state," he said, referring to Jordan, which, he pointed, out, is "part of Israel according to the Bible."

He said he does not see a "moral duty" to create a Palestinian state within Israel but that he has no problem with Palestinians living in Israel as citizens, as long as they are law-abiding. "The only thing we want is for them to stop killing us."

As recently as 15 years ago, Rabbi Aviner recalls, he used to travel regularly from his home in Beit El to nearby Ramallah to shop. "We were living together in peace," he said of the pre-Oslo era.

In fact, he said, his 25-year-old yeshiva – which was also a yeshiva in the 1930s – enjoys a good relationship with its Arab neighbours in the Muslim quarter of Jerusalem. There is, however, an element of wariness, he noted, explaining that three of its almost 250 students have been killed by Arabs.

Aryeh Lederman, Ateret Cohanim's director – who spent four years in Toronto as a child when his parents were shlichim in the early 1980s – added that one of the Arab neighbours safeguarded the yeshiva for more than three decades, and returned the key to an Israeli soldier when the city was reunified in 1967.

DIRECTOR OF EDUCATION/HEAD OF SCHOOL

Bialik Hebrew Day School is seeking a Director of Education to replace Dr. Uri Korin upon his retirement after 19 years of successful leadership of the school. The position will be available August 1, 2006.

This is a unique opportunity to work in an exciting, dynamic Jewish educational institution with a history of academic excellence and a strong commitment to the State of Israel and to Jewish heritage and culture. Rooted in the Labour Zionist Movement, Bialik serves more than 800 students from Junior Kindergarten through Grade 8. Our students learn Hebrew, English, Yiddish and French within our Jewish and General Studies programs.

As the Head of School, the Director of Education is accountable to the Board of Directors for all aspects of Bialik's academic and management functions. The successful candidate will have vision and leadership qualities, strong communication and interpersonal skills and a wealth of experience as a teacher and administrator. Excellent professional qualifications, including as a minimum a Masters degree in education or a related field, are required. The ideal candidate will be bilingual in English and Hebrew.

We welcome applications from educators who believe they can lead our school. Please send a detailed résumé to:

Special to The CJN

Terrorism in Israel isn't limited to suicide bombings. VIP assassinations, attacks on transportation and aviation and cyber-terrorism – "which is starting to be very serious" – are also threats that Israel is working to prevent, Israeli Brig-Gen. Dubi Yung said in a talk at Beth Tikvah Synagogue last week.

"The Americans suffered half a day of mega-terror," he said, referring to the events of Sept. 11, 2001, but Israel is always on guard against terror attacks.

His strategy for fighting terrorism: a three-pronged response involving public vigilance, the security fence, and extensive co-operation between different elements of Israel's security sector.

Co-operation between the intelligence service, police and security services, border guards and army is essential to keeping everyone safe, said Yung, the commander of special forces for the Israel Police.

"The best intelligence that doesn't come to the forces in the field is useless."

The goal, he emphasized, is to prevent attacks such as suicide bombings from happening in advance. "We want to hit the terrorist in his house, not at the door to the morgue."

Yung said intelligence prompted an urgent message to employees of a private security service at a mall in Kfar Saba in 2002, warning that a suicide bomber was on the way to the mall.

Mall security set out on patrol and three minutes later, a man blew himself up at the entrance. The bomb killed a security guard and injured several civilians, but the bomber never made it into the mall, where the casualty toll would likely have been higher.

"That's the one thing about fighting terrorism," Yung said. "Sometimes you have to talk about minimum damage."

In addition to private security companies, Israel has about 50,000 volunteer police officers who help the regular police force when it has to deal with security issues, said Yung.

Ordinary civilians, however, are also integral to the country's security.

"If there is a difference between Israeli citizens and the rest of the world, it's this: public awareness," he said.

Israel received seven million 911 calls last year, which works out to more than one call per citizen, Yung said. Israelis who have been in the army have learned to be aware of their surroundings, and children are also taught to keep a watchful eye.

"The public is our partner," he said. "We try to share as much as possible, as quickly as possible."

The West Bank security fence has been an important element of Israeli security, and while it's not the only reason for the reduction in suicide bombings, it's a contributing factor, Yung said.

The statistics speak for themselves: there were 162 suicide bombings before the wall was built, compared to only seven since its construction, he added.

From October 2000 to December 2004, Israel has experienced more than 8,000 terrorist attacks. More than 1,000 people have been killed, and more than 7,000 injured. Although only four per cent of terror attacks are suicide bombings, they account for 45 per cent of injuries.

"Suicide attacks are a very good weapon," he said.

Yung said he operates entirely behind the scenes, adding that he would rather do his job unhindered than talk to the media or engage in a public opinion war.

The day after his lecture at Beth Tikvah, he was scheduled to talk to 125 RCMP, CSIS and OPP officers about law enforcement strategies.

Yung's speech was sponsored by the Mackenzie Institute, a non-profit organization interested in political instability and terrorism, and the Media Action group, which promotes Israel in the media.

Freedom's victory

The statement that the "evil-doers were prostrate before us" must have sent shivers up the spine of all those who were privileged to hear that broadcast.

But the shivers must have also brought pain, along with a sense of relief, for an entire continent lay in ruins. And everyone who heard the prime minister that afternoon knew of it.

After September 1939, Europe became a choked and choking charnel house. Nearly half a million British and Commonwealth soldiers died in World War II (in all fighting theatres). Canada alone lost 39,000 soldiers. Total allied military losses exceeded 18 million. In all, more than 55 million human beings lost their lives in the war. More than half that number, some 30 million, were civilians. It is a staggering number, well beyond our abilities to truly comprehend.

And of course, among those civilians were the Jews of Europe, who were hunted, set upon, preyed upon, rounded up, humiliated, tortured, shot, gassed and slaughtered as an overriding, pre-eminent objective of the mighty Nazi military and civilian apparatus.

For those of us born after the war, it is very difficult to relate to the emotions of V-E Day, to understand what our parents and grandparents felt when they heard the announcement.

We were born into a world where "the evil-doers" had been defeated. Our fighting forces, our way of life, our values had emerged victorious. We lived free, generally untroubled by world events, and we grew up, more or less, with the same ease by which we drew our breath.

But the world we were born into might have been other than free.

Freedom was not our destiny. It was an inheritance from the generation that fought for it and paid so dearly for it with so many lives.

Only those who were in England or caught in the Nazis' vise can recall the dark dread they felt after France fell in only a matter of days, when England stood alone. In the first year of the war, more than 40,000 British civilians died from the nightly bombings. And hundreds of thousands of Jews had already been murdered.

Freedom was not assured to us. It was won for us by courage and sacrifice.

The men and women in the photo on page one celebrating the defeat of the evil-doers and the imminent return home of their soldiers knew that fact as surely as they knew that they must teach it to us, their children, and as surely as they must have hoped that we, in turn, would teach it to our children.

May their hope be our promise.

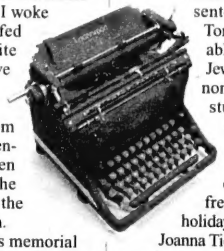
Israel's moments of silence

I could not agree more with the sentiments expressed in Gil Troy's column, "Let's join our Israeli cousins in their mourning" (CJN, April 28). During my last visit to Israel, I saw Israeli drivers getting out of their cars on the Ayalon Expressway in Tel Aviv and stand for a moment's silence as sirens blared across the country on Yom Hazikaron.

With the arrival of the Internet, we Jews in the Diaspora have a new way to join with our Israeli brothers and sisters during their moment of silence. Last year, I woke up at 3:30 a.m., fired up my computer, surfed over to Rashut Hashidur's website (http://bet.iba.org.il/) and clicked on "Bet Live – Shidur Chai." I listened to the live streaming broadcast of the Israel Broadcasting Authority's coverage of Israel's official Yom Hazikaron ceremonies and then stood at attention in front of my window, facing east, when the sound of the sirens came through the speakers hooked up to my computer. I did the same thing the week before on Yom Hashoah.



The Internet brought the sound of Israel's memorial sirens right into my home here in Canada. Wouldn't it be a powerful statement if all of us here in North America woke up in the middle of the night to stand with Israel on these two important memorial days?

Response to Zeifman

Larry Zeifman ignores what was actually said by Martin Lockshin ("Offensive material at shul steps over the line," CJN, April 7) and instead parrots the very thing that he cautions against ("Response to Lockshin," Letters, CJN, April 28).

An Orthodox rabbi and biblical scholar, Lockshin noted that we Jews do not simply read the Torah and leave it at that. Would Zeifman or his friend have us take Deuteronomy 20:9 literally and put to death all who curse their fathers or mothers?

We practise a Judaism that has millennia of textual analysis and explanation by our great sages and commentators to help us understand the meaning of the text and how it applies to our lives. And this essential process of interpretation continues in our own day.

University exam on Passover

I was quite surprised and deeply disturbed by Joanne and Charles Ticker's comments and actions regarding the University of Western Ontario's setting an exam on April 23 ("Western sets exam for night of first seder", CJN, April 21).

I am a graduate of an Ontario university. Many of my exams fell on either Shabbat or holidays such as Passover. I was the only observant Jew in my professional program and approximately 10 per cent of my class was Jewish.

I informed the dean and the head of the professional school at the beginning of each semester of the dates of the holidays and of any scheduling conflicts. I also presented a letter from my synagogue's rabbi in Toronto to reinforce the fact that I would not be able to write an exam when it conflicted with a Jewish holiday. Support was not provided by my non-observant Jewish classmates or the Jewish student federation. My professors were not always pleased when there was a conflict, but all offered a make-up exam.

I would suggest that Jewish students enjoy the freedom of Passover and the freedom offered by universities and enjoy the holiday and write the make-up exam. No one forced Joanna Ticker to give up the Passover seder and instead write her exam on Shabbat. On the contrary, the university offered her a solution that requires a bit of sacrifice on both parts.

Anti-Semitism at McMaster

In the article "McMaster students express grievances over SPHR event," (CJN, April 21), I am quoted as saying, "We had this nice campus community that wasn't poisoned by anti-Semitism." This is incorrect. What I should have said is that we had a good-natured academic community that, while already poisoned by some anti-Semitism, was not what one might called a completely poisoned well – nor is it completely poisoned now.

The poison of anti-Semitism existed when I arrived at McMaster University in 2003. It existed under the guise of anti-Israel activities and stances and it existed when students and faculty members took objection to Jewish practices such as Sabbat observance, daily prayer and observance of Jewish holidays. The only difference over the past two years is that the anti-Semitism at McMaster, much like the so-called "new anti-Semitism" elsewhere, has become more visible, more acceptable, more mainstream, more frequently encountered and stronger in its form.

I believe only Jews can fight anti-Semitism. Gentiles, while they can and should be enlisted in our fight, must see us fighting first. If we do not speak up for ourselves, history has taught us that no one will.

Yad Vashem building makes a moral statement

By MARTIN PERETZ
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

It was the prophet Isaiah who gave Yad Vashem its name. "And to them will I give within my house and within my walls a memorial and… an everlasting name" – which is precisely what the site of remembrance in Jerusalem for the six million victims of the Jewish catastrophe in Europe is trying to do.

A name and a history for every one of those murdered by the Nazis and their numerous collaborators: the pious and the free-thinking; the wise and the dumb; the beautiful and the plain; scholars and shoemakers; seamstresses and skiers; serious folk and slackers; the poor and the rich and those in the middle; men, women, young children – at least 1½ million of the latter.

No exceptions made, except by luck or the special bravery of the doomed. Yad Vashem was not the first monument in Jerusalem to the European hell: a terrifying cave of artifacts and plaques was established on Mount Zion a few years after the war. But it was Yad Vashem that introduced the combined ideal of a memorial and a name, of commemoration and scholarship.

It was first imagined during World War II and formalized immediately after the war at an international Zionist conference held in London. The project was put into the hands of the National Council of the Jews of Palestine, the singularly democratic authority that had been preparing the Yishuv for sovereignty.

It opened in 1957, the first such institution anywhere, on a richly forested hill overlooking the western outskirts of the city in the Jewish state that – had it been permitted by the great powers to exist 15 years earlier – would have systematically absorbed the stalked Jews of civilized Europe.

The original installation, heavily didactic and built almost entirely around photographs, had hardly any architecture. It felt like a bomb shelter, or a cave carved out of the earth.

It did adjoin a handsome stone memorial hall, enclosing a stark floor map of Europe punctuated by the eternally horrifying names of death camps: Bergen-Belsen, Auschwitz, Treblinka, Sobibor, Majdanek and so on. An eternal light is all that illumines the macabre cartography.

All of this still stands, as does the Avenue of the Righteous, sided by trees planted to honour some 18,000 gentiles – not all that many of them, when you think about it – who risked their lives to rescue Jews from Moloch. It is from this route of Christian heroes that visitors make their way to the shattering experience.

Now the Israeli-Canadian architect Moshe Safdie has built a new Yad Vashem on the same sacred site.

Safdie had previously designed and set in place a memorial centred around an actual railroad car that ferried Jews from the ghettos to the lager (historians tell us that the train schedules were indispensable to the success of the Final Solution, a theme explained in the new exhibits) and a children's memorial centred on a single lit candle that, through mirror and magnification – and a recorded recitation of the known names of the perished – hauntingly conveys the magnitude of the disaster.

But, in mid-March, he unveiled an amazing new structure, a space at once primordial and highly modern, to hold the terrible evidence that no one wanted to confront at the time – not U.S. president Franklin Delano Roosevelt, not the pro-Zionist British prime minister Winston Churchill, and not the non-Jewish Jews who owned the New York Times – that the Jewish people were being snuffed out.

The 200-metre-long structure is a three-dimensional cement triangle, which burrows through the mountain revealing the building's beginning and its end, both of which are brilliantly cantilevered into space.

Safdie's signature command of natural light – in this case, light from a narrow skylight running along the structure's apex cutting through the alp – illumines the entire dark journey, through the deep prism itself and the historical galleries undulating on the sides.

You cannot skip one gallery for another, one part of the narrative for another. Safdie has cut angular trenches through his chronological passageway, and one of the first is filled with books – by Einstein, Freud, Werfel, Zweig, and the other Jewish degenerates – that the Nazis gathered for the burnings visible on the adjoining video screens. (It was not long before people were gathered for burnings.)

And, at the end of the dark journey, you emerge in the clear sunlight on the Jerusalem hills. From five feet back, and 10, all you see is sky. And then you are quite literally free. You are over land, the land of Israel. But the voyage is always curtained by the concrete.

Over the land of Israel: there is a Zionist dimension to the exhibit at Yad Vashem, and it is altogether apposite. Middle-class liberalism in Europe demanded of the Jews that they assimilate, and, when they did, they were resented.

Social democracy denied the Jews their peoplehood. Communism saw the Jews as enemies and even made an alliance with Adolf Hitler and then prepared its own onslaught against them. Religious Judaism (with some exceptions) instilled among Jews a debilitating passivism. Only the Zionists grasped that Europe was doomed soil for the Jewish people. A few European Jewish communities experienced an exodus during the 1930s, and almost all the people who left were Zionists.

Thessaloniki is one instance. In 1935-36, 15,000 Jews from Salonika emigrated to Palestine and built the port of Haifa. Some 50,000 Jews stayed behind, of whom fewer than 2,000 survived the war. This surely was among the highest "kill ratios" of the entire Holocaust.

The exhibit at Yad Vashem starts with an exquisite magic lantern video presentation of old footage – the home movies of the martyred – by Michal Rovner. Here you see those who were alive just before they would be dead. The footage moves from east to west, in a meshing of map and landscape, from right to left, as in a Torah scroll. I cannot get out of my mind the young girls beckoning the visitor into their lives with the gentle inward waving of their hands. I cannot forget their smiles. I bitterly note their astonishing diversity.

This building may be the most moral statement made by architecture in our time. Its rendering of the life of the murdered is searing and subtle. You can almost wear their shoes, look through their eyeglasses, read their poems of despair. You almost feel what it was like trying to get bread in the Warsaw ghetto or being trapped in Budapest when the Germans, already almost completely vanquished, mobilized themselves for their last great massacre of Hungarian Jewry in Auschwitz.

And then you come to a photograph of Heinrich Himmler, and you listen to a recording of a speech he made to SS officers in 1943:

"It is one of those things that is easily said. 'The Jewish people is being exterminated,' every party member will tell you… And then along they all come, all the 80 million upright Germans, and each one has his decent Jew…

"And none of them has seen it, has endured it. Most of you will know what it means when 100 bodies lie together, when there are 500, or when there are 1,000. And to have seen this through, and… to have remained decent, has made us hard and is a page of glory never mentioned and never to be mentioned."

It was not just six million who perished. It was an entire culture that was put to death. Still, consider the raw numbers. At Yad Vashem, three million dead men, women, and children are individually recorded in the archives, some even with pictures.

My mother, who came from a Polish village called Levertov, had six siblings, one of whom survived (he went east to Russia). His daughter and grandchildren now live in the United States, and a son and his family live in Israel. The five who perished were all married and had children, perhaps four or five each.

My father, who came from the same shtetl, left eight brothers and sisters at home, and pleaded with them to come to the United States (which wasn't so easy) or go to Palestine. All of them were married with the usual number of children. Only one of these children, a daughter of one of my father's sisters, got out, taking the underground route to Palestine, running the blockade, and ending up on a kibbutz in what is now Israel. Still alive at 90, she has two children, five grandchildren, and three great-grandchildren.

So here is the disaster writ small: Had her 30- or 40-odd cousins lived, how many of the family line would still be alive? How many more Jews would be alive if the six million had not been slaughtered?

There was one discordant note in the opening ceremonies, and it was the participation of United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan. He had taken time out on his way to Jerusalem to pay homage at the Ramallah grave of Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, a certified legatee of the anti-Semitism of the Nazis. How diplomatic!

The secretary-general's very presence evoked the offending memory of his predecessors: U Thant, who removed UN troops from the Sinai – a decade-old barrier to war between Israel and Egypt – on the command of then-Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser, which unleashed the Six-Day War; and, most grotesquely, Kurt Waldheim, whose personal role in the Final Solution to "the Jewish problem" was suppressed by the great powers and the UN bureaucracy.

And what were Annan's qualifications for this ceremony? Well, he is an expert on genocide, an expert of a certain sort. In his diplomatic practice of the 1990s, in various UN posts, he became a genocide-denier, since he refused to act against the extermination wars in Bosnia, Rwanda, the Democratic Republic of Congo and Sudan.

If the history of our time is written honestly, it will record that Annan stood passively by as the new exterminators went to work. Shame will be his memorial, his everlasting name.

This article appeared in the April 18 issue of the New Republic.

Opinions

Anger over academic boycott

A heated debate has both preceded and followed a recent vote by Britain's Association of University Teachers (AUT) to boycott Israel's Bar Ilan and Haifa universities. Hebrew University was also slated for such censure, because of its alleged "confiscation of land occupied by Palestinian families in east Jerusalem," but, for reasons that are not immediately clear, it was later dropped from the AUT's hit list.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Meanwhile, the charge against Haifa was that it is "failing to uphold academic freedom," because the university apparently "disciplined" one of its professors for "supporting a student who wrote about attacks on Palestinians during the founding of the State of Israel." What really happened, in fact, is that the student in question was found to have fabricated the "evidence" that constituted the basis of his thesis. He later apologized to an Israeli court for his deception, after a suit was brought against him by soldiers involved in the case. Moreover, according to the university, no disciplinary action has ever been taken against the professor.

Bar Ilan was targeted because, according to the AUT, "it runs courses at colleges in the occupied West Bank" and is thus "directly involved with the occupation of Palestinian territories, contrary to United Nations resolutions".

Both the Israeli Foreign Ministry and the Anti-Defamation League have already registered their outrage against the AUT decision, and media outlets in Israel, Britain and the United States have been inundated with calls to have it revoked. Britain's National Postgraduate Committee, representing masters' and doctoral students, has come out against the boycott, and even Arab Al-Quds University in east Jerusalem, headed by Sari Nusseibeh, has expressed its opposition, preferring instead "to build bridges, not walls".

The idea of an academic boycott of Israel first began to command attention about three years ago. In a letter to the Guardian newspaper, 120 signatories from universities across Europe called for a moratorium on funding for Israeli research. Then, as now, there was an enormous outcry against such undisguised vilification of the Jewish state. But then, unlike now, the campaign failed to sway opinion in a way that might have had any lasting impact. The current scenario is somewhat different, though its effect may still turn out to be minimal. The reality, however, is that regardless of the actual result and no matter how unseemly, hypocritical and morally bankrupt the current initiative is, it has nonetheless created a precedent that other Israel-bashers will be quick to reference.

It is, therefore, especially important for constituencies both inside and outside of academia to speak up quickly and forcefully against the AUT's assault on the freedoms and dignity of Israel's institutes of higher learning and those who work within their framework.

For a few weeks each spring, in keeping with the spirit of Purim, Israel dresses up in a deceptively lush green, masquerading briefly as a gentle and temperate land. The dusty river gorges gush with rushing torrents and colourful splashes of flowers spread good cheer. Birds sing merrily in the cosy, warm air. Periodic showers keep things moist, fertile, fragrant and soft.

But then, with characteristic sledge-hammer-to-the-head abruptness, you awaken one morning from this delicious vernal reverie to behold fields full of hissing yellow straw, dense thickets of mean and prickly thistles, dry seed pods rattling nastily in the wind, and a hot frying pan, called summer, beating down mercilessly and relentlessly on your sizzling skull. Your lips chapped, your nostrils parched, you rub your eyes in disbelief at how so much goodness could vanish so quickly and so completely.

Welcome to the Middle East.

Alas, this is no Denmark, no France. Spring does not ease gently, gradually and gracefully into summer. It is clobbered into extinction within a few days by withering April winds off the desert. Those sweetly warbling birds of yesterday flee into the dark shadows of trees and buildings, where all of us spend the next eight months gasping for breath.

As with the seasons, so it is with just about everything else. Hereabouts, transitions and transformations are sudden and unpredictable. "Process" is not part of the local vocabulary. The sudden geological upheavals that characterize this great earthquake zone spill over into human affairs as well. One moment you are basking in the soft, green grass daydreaming about imminent peace, and the next you are being swallowed up by the yawning black chasm of a murderous intifadah.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

So it is that I look askance at the latest political developments. As usual, everything is happening too fast and there is little sense of a natural progression from one set of conditions and attitudes to another. In what seems to be the blinking of an eye, voices in the Palestinian camp have sanitized their brutish and murderous speech and are speaking of historical reconciliations and enduring peace in place of eternal warfare against the Jew and the Zionist.

To my taste, the latest utopia smells much too much like the one five bloody years ago, when our Palestinian "partners" were about to sign a peace treaty. As I remember it, they changed their minds at the very last moment and chose, instead, to sign our death warrants.

Salim, a Palestinian shop owner and acquaintance, tried to explain to me two years ago why Israel was done for. Affluence and success, he said, had made Jews soft. "We Palestinians can survive on bread and olives," he hissed scornfully. "We will outlast you!" These days Salim is singing a very different tune. "You know," he said to me a few days back, "most of us want only peace and quiet. We want to do a little business, care for our families. After all, we Israelis and Palestinians are brothers, cousins, not so?" I nodded cordially, meaninglessly, and took my leave.

Yes, it is hard to believe, given the present optimistic mood, that scarcely one year ago we were still swimming in blood, visiting gravesites, memorials and bereaved families, blessing foreign tourists, and looking aghast upon a steady onslaught of the most hateful propaganda imaginable emerging from the Palestinian media.

Today there is not a vacant hotel room, Palestinian security personnel are sipping coffee arm-in-arm with their Israeli counterparts, and those same TV stations are promoting peace, not suicide bombings.

There was never a more riotous, more joyful, cathartic Purim than this year's celebration. Our society had slogged its way through a nightmarish episode, battered but ultimately intact. A new day, it appeared, was dawning, a day full of hope and promise. Mahmoud Abbas, George W. Bush, King Abdullah II – absolutely everybody is saying so.

With 30-odd years of Israeli reality under my belt, I move much more slowly and cautiously than once I did. There is a hallowed tradition around these parts of moods of celebration, hope and optimism melding seamlessly and precipitously into cataclysms. And though they didn't reach this far west, those tsunamis were just my kind of metaphor.

Israel's post-Gaza strategy: conflict management

Conventional wisdom aside, the planned Israeli withdrawal of civilians and military bases from Gaza will not "kick-start the 'road map' peace plan." On the contrary, the concept of unilateral separation is a carefully considered response to the catastrophic failure of the Oslo "peace process." Polls and other indicators show that the vast majority of Israelis, including Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, have no expectations of a quick return to negotiations with the Palestinians. Although Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat is gone, his shadow remains dominant, and moving Palestinian society away from terror and towards compromise will take decades.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

As a result, the next steps after disengagement from Gaza (and also from the area near Jenin in the northern Samaria region of the West Bank) are not related to "permanent status negotiations." Any effort to raise complex issues such as final borders, the future of Jerusalem, and the claims of refugees will lead again to extreme demands and more violence. These issues require a gradual movement toward compromise over a period of generations. In the meantime, the emphasis must be on conflict management.

The Middle East road map – despite wide lip service in Europe, Washington and Ottawa – is only a virtual peace plan, and one that's a long way from implementation. It was adopted in 2003 as a result of the desire, particularly on the part of the European Union and the United Nations, to be seen to be doing something – anything – that could be construed to be contributing to the dream of Middle East peace. But these messianic terms have no resemblance to the situation on the ground. The first stage – dismantling Palestinian terror groups and collecting their weapons – looks more distant than ever.

Therefore, the disengagement from Gaza is better understood as a step toward conflict management through separating the Israeli and Palestinian populations to the greatest possible extent, in the absence of a formal agreement. In many ways, this is a gradual reversal of the process that began with the 1967 war, which removed the barbed wire and other barriers along the 1949 armistice lines and brought the two societies into close contact. But after almost four decades of this experiment in co-existence and integration, the evidence of failure is painfully obvious to most Israelis.

This basic fact has propelled the construction of the separation barrier, and the decision to phase out the employment of Palestinians in Israel. The long-term survival of Israel as a democratic state that is the home of the Jewish people requires the separation from the hostile and growing Palestinian population. This is a painful process, one that involves separation from parts of the biblical homeland, the removal of many Israelis from their homes, and the potential for violence from a small group of fanatics. But strategically, this process is necessary.

As a result, the unilateral disengagement from Gaza is likely to be followed by additional stages in implementing unilateral separation. Indeed, the public emphasis on completing the barrier in the areas near Jerusalem, Ariel and in the southern part of Israel has revived recently, and the government has been strongly criticized for the slow pace of construction.

Later, additional options for disengagement in Judea and Samaria will be considered in light of the success in the case of Gaza, and in combination with strengthening the Israeli hold on vital areas, particularly near Jerusalem. Success will be measured in terms of security (and the absence of terrorism) and diplomacy. If, as many expect, Palestinian terrorist groups see this as a victory, and try to escalate their rocket attacks against Israel cities, will the Israeli military response be more effective without the complications of defending settlements and civilians? And will Europe and the United States condemn Israel for responding to such attacks, ignoring the disengagement process?

The bottom line is that although separation makes sense strategically, many risks are involved, both in terms of the potential for internal violence (the possibility of "civil war" is highly exaggerated) and external conflict. But if it succeeds in managing the conflict for a generation, this will make life more bearable for both Israelis and Palestinians.

Eclectic movies from the Jewish film fest

This year's edition of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which runs from May 7 to 15, offers an eclectic selection of movies. The four diverse films previewed here reflect the festival's mission to enlighten and stimulate viewers.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Wagner's Confession, a taut documentary, tells an amazing story, one I have never previously heard. It confirms the credo that truth can be stranger than fiction, so brace yourself.

It's about a German Nazi war criminal who masqueraded as a Jew and succeeded brilliantly in his disguise.

Gunter Reinemer, known as Hans Wagner, was a human chameleon. Born in Dresden, he joined the SS as a young man. During the Holocaust, he was posted to the Treblinka death camp, where he allegedly killed more than 100 Jews.

After the war, the U.S. Secret Service recruited him as a spy. His job, no less, was to track down war criminals. As a reward for his services, his American handlers gave him some canny but unusual advice: avoid detection by pretending to be a Jew.

So much for de-Nazification.

Always on the move, he lived in France and East Germany. A ladies' man, he left his first wife and two children for a French woman, and had a number of relationships.

During the late 1960s, he visited Israel, immersed himself in Jewish customs and bought a yarmulke. Returning to Israel, he met a prosperous widow from Poland.

Claiming to be a Holocaust survivor like her, he seduced and married the woman. In 1973, the newlyweds settled in Caracas, Venezuela, and became members of the local Jewish community.

When he died, having gotten away with murder, he was buried in a Jewish cemetery. But after his death, two German detectives assigned to investigate his industrial espionage activities blew his cover.

Today, Rosa, feeling terribly betrayed, can't bear to hear his name. Nor can one of his sons.

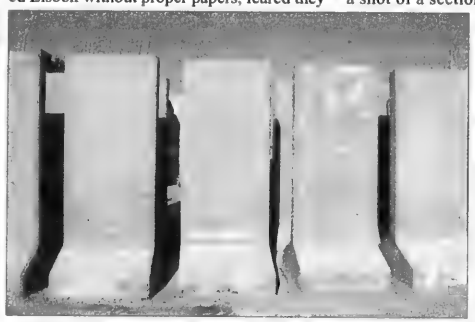
Upward of 50,000 European Jews under Nazi occupation passed through Lisbon en route to safe havens in the United States and elsewhere.

The German-Jewish grandparents of the film's director, Daniel Blaufuks, belonged to this group. They chose Portugal because it was a neutral country on a continent ravaged by turmoil and upheaval.

Blaufuks' grandparents, from Magdeburg, arrived in Lisbon – a nest of foreign intrigue and spies – in the spring of 1935, two years after Hitler's accession to power. Although permitted to enter Portugal, Jews were forbidden to work there. Nevertheless, his grandmother found gainful employment as a seamstress, and his grandfather worked as a door-to-door salesman before becoming a fairly prosperous toy manufacturer.

Less fortunate refugees depended on subsidies from American Jewish organizations. The Portuguese government did not extend financial assistance.

Ordinary Portuguese citizens had no idea that the refugees were under severe psychological pressure. Many refugees, having reached Lisbon without proper papers, feared they would be deported or arrested. In desperation, some committed suicide.



A walled section of Israel's separation fence

The majority, however, managed to rebuild their lives outside Portugal. Blaufuks' grandparents never left Portugal, where his mother was born. They felt at home there and had no desire to uproot themselves once more. Yet, on the other hand, they were culturally German and never had Portuguese friends.

Under Strange Skies, a documentary about exile and accommodation and despair and freedom, unfolds through the medium of reminiscences and vintage Portuguese newsreels.

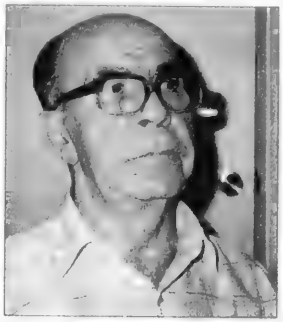
Israel is currently building its controversial separation barrier, which is expected to be finished by year's end. Built to deter terrorism, it snakes along and through the West Bank. Consisting of barbed-wire fences, high concrete walls, fortifications, ditches and no-go zones, it may yet define Israel's permanent border.

Simone Bitton's Wall takes a closer, somewhat jaundiced view of the barrier, which Palestinian Arabs universally regard as an obscenity intended to imprison them and thwart their desire for a contiguous state. The film resounds to the roar of tractors and earth-moving equipment lifting concrete slabs into place. It opens with a shot of a section of the wall emblazoned with fluttering doves and with a seemingly innocuous conversation between a Jewish girl and the filmmaker.

Jews and Arabs express their views. Amos Yaron, the director-general of Israel's ministry of defence, explains the rationale for building the fence (which costs about $2 million US per kilometre). It is not only meant to reduce violence against Israelis, but also to prevent the theft of cars and agricultural equipment.

Ironically, many of the labourers are Arabs who cannot find work anywhere else. This is hardly surprising. Arab workers, almost single-handedly, built the settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Ahmed is one of these workers. He is content with his salary, but says the fence is worthless without peace. His boss, an Iraqi Jew named Shimon Abraham, suggests the fence is good for Arabs because it is a source of employment.



Gunter Reinemer

Motti, an Israeli Jew and resident of Har Homa, a new development in eastern Jerusalem, seems to agree with Ahmed. He doubts whether the barrier will be effective, and dismisses it as "a waste of money." Is there an alternative? Motti has no solution.

Wall illustrates the proposition that a security fence cannot defuse the complexity of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

The sex trade in Israel flourishes on the backs of prostitutes from the former Soviet Union.

Nili Tal's revealing film, Women for Sale, a profile of four sex workers from Ukraine and Uzbekistan, claims that 20,000 young eastern European women work the streets of the Jewish state.

Russia is a prime supplier. In the past decade, 500,000 Russian women, facing bleak employment prospects in their ancestral homeland, have gone west and turned to the world's oldest profession.

They are brought illegally to Israel via the Sinai Peninsula. Zehava Gal-On, chair of the Knesset's committee against trade in women, said recently that from 3,000 to 5,000 women have been smuggled into the country since 2001, and that trafficking in women is an extremely lucrative business.

Sold and re-sold to pimps for $8,000 to $10,000 and forced to work seven days a week, often servicing three to four clients per hour, they are virtual commodities who despise their lot in life. They dread being touched, fondled and penetrated by total strangers.

Two of the prostitutes are Muslims. Their families, of course, have no inkling of what they do. Since their parents and siblings live in impoverished conditions in the former Soviet Union, they depend on their remittances.

Pulling no punches, Women for Sale exposes Israel's flesh trade and the dark underside of Israeli society.

Four Canadian Rabbis participate in mission to the Ukraine

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

Four Canadian rabbis - two from Toronto and two from Montreal - recently participated in a United Jewish Communities (UJC) Rabbis' mission to Odessa, Kiev (Ukraine) and Jerusalem where unity was more than a concept, it was reality. United Jewish Communities is the umbrella organization for Jewish federations across North America.

The mission was multi-layered in its purpose and goals, creating unity on all different levels. It not only brought Jewish leadership to Ukraine, most of whom had never been before, it also brought recently ordained rabbis together with mentors to learn and interact with one another, giving everyone new insight into the work of UJC.

"This mission was a wonderful opportunity to get to know a new generation of rabbis," Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl explained. "It is important to take younger rabbis on these kinds of missions, giving them a deeper contact with UJC."

"The mentoring process was a wonderful model," Rabbi David Bauman enthused. "Bringing young rabbis together with senior leadership offers enormous opportunity. It was a very enriching experience, professionally and spiritually."

Another unifying facet of the mission was the relationship building between rabbis representing various religious affiliations. "This was the first time I was on a mission with rabbis from all levels of observance and affiliation," Rabbi Adam Scheier said. "But it was very natural; you realize we all came to this profession for the same reasons; we all face similar issues. I found real colleagues on this trip who I will maintain a relationship with."

Camaraderie and solidarity were found in the most surprising places. While stranded in Kiev because of a winter storm, the rabbis were forced to depend on the kindness of Kiev's Jewish community for food and shelter. "I knew heading out on this trip that my awareness of the work of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) and the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) in these communities would improve," Rabbi Scheier said emotionally. "But it was amazing when we needed help from the Kiev community, when we were stranded, they were able to support and embrace us. It showed me that they are a true community, and this reciprocity of support was overwhelming."

Sense of Spadina expands program

The Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) has been offering a tour of the old Jewish neighborhood situated in the Kensington Market area for the past 30 years. This walking tour includes a visit to one of the original synagogues in that area, the Cecil Street Community Centre, as well as buildings that once housed Jewish theatres, restaurants and businesses.

Man and young boy walking down Spadina Avenue ca.1947.

This year the program will be expanded. Additional tour guides, who were recruited from Toronto universities and trained by senior tour guide, Cyrel Troster, have been added to the roster. This will enable the OJA to provide more tours throughout the course of the tour season, which runs from April to October.

"I am very excited about our new tour schedule," Troster said. "It essentially opens up this program to individuals who are interested in taking the tour on their own."

For scheduling information visit www.jewishtoronto.com and click on the Sense of Spadina icon. For more information or to register for a tour, please contact Donna Bernardo at 416-635-2883 ext. 187.

Perspective

Touring two troubled communities

From Lithuania to Argentina - By Harold Wolfe

Harold Wolfe recently visited Vilnius and Buenos Aires on UJA Federation of Greater Toronto fact-finding missions. This is the first of his two-part series.

The Jewish communities of Vilnius, Lithuania and Argentina share a number of similarities, but although each is under stress, the reasons for their distress are different.

In the case of Vilnius, this formerly vibrant Jewish community was substantially wiped out during World War II. The few Jews who remain (5,000 now live in Lithuania) appeared to be poor and require substantial support. Even though some Jews own assets (such as the hotel we stayed in, which we were told is owned by Israelis), kosher food did not appear to be readily available. At the one functioning synagogue that we attended Friday night and Saturday morning, there were few locals in attendance, and they were mostly elderly.

However, the Jewish community of Lithuania strongly feels the need to preserve Yiddishkeit and Jewish culture. After all, Lithuanian Jewry (and particularly the Jews of Vilnius) were, at one time, one of the most important communities of Jewish culture and learning, outside Israel. The current community deeply feels a responsibility to the victims of the Holocaust - who had created this great culture - to preserve Lithuania's Jewish identity so that Hitler will not have succeeded in his quest to wipe out Lithuanian Jewish life.

It was for this reason that we found our Shabbat dinner with 28 young Jews from Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia - counselors at a summer camp for Jewish youngsters - to be very exciting and stimulating. We enjoyed speaking to these young adults and singing Shabbat songs together, but we were disappointed at how little "Jewishness" they displayed, although it's not surprising. Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia were occupied by the USSR from 1945 until 1989, when religious practice was prohibited. Today, all young Jews in these three countries are learning or relearning how to be Jewish. They will need much help to accomplish this, some of which is already being provided by Chabad and by the American Joint Distribution Committee (commonly known as the "Joint," supported, in part, by the North American Jewish federation system).

We did not witness recent acts of antisemitism in Lithuania, and I understand that, in general, Jewish and non-Jewish Lithuanians get along well. Notwithstanding this, acts of antisemitism do occur. To the credit of the Lithuanian Catholic Church, the bishops of Lithuania, in 2000, finally issued a letter expressing their regrets at the acts of "some" Catholics during World War II.

As for Argentina, which I visited earlier this year, the Jewish population of 200,000 represents about half a percent of the country's total population of 36 million. Eighty five percent of Argentinian Jewry lives in Buenos Aires, with the rest spread out over 55 communities.

My visit confirmed what I had heard on other occasions: no matter how much the general population suffers, the Jewish population suffers more.

Without going into all the ups and downs of Argentina's history, the country has suffered extended periods of poor government, which affected the economy. Between 1976 and 1983, 30,000 people "disappeared." To disappear meant to be abducted, detained, tortured and probably killed, with no hope of legal process. Many of the "disappeared" were dropped into the ocean from military airplanes. Inevitably, a large number of Jews - some seven percent - were included among the "disappeared."

Despite all this, the Jewish community was financially self-sufficient and comfortable. Then, two terrorist attacks occurred. The first destroyed the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires in 1992, with much loss of life. The second explosion, which took place in 1994, destroyed the AMIA headquarters of Jewish communal services, killing 85 and wounding 200.

If that were not enough, soon thereafter, the Argentinean economy collapsed, along with two banks, in which many Jews had deposited their life savings and suffered substantial losses. The economy still has not recovered. The savings of many formerly middle class families have been wiped out, and, now, over 25 percent of Jews in Buenos Aires require financial assistance. Equally disturbing is the tendency, we were told, of authorities not to investigate antisemitic acts or for investigations to go nowhere.

All of these difficulties have caused Argentina's Jews to view life with much cynicism. They do not trust the police, the courts, or their politicians. I was told that many young families from Buenos Aires have left Argentina. Many others are considering this option, which will cause future hardship for the Jewish community.

So what are we doing to assist Jews in Argentina and Lithuania? More in next week's column.

Walk with Israel could be a lifesaver

Bone marrow registry set to take place at Walk

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

While this year's UJA Federation Walk with Israel is a great way for participants to show their pride and support for Israel, the May 29th event also has the potential to save lives.

Dr. Gordon Arbess, an HIV primary care physician at Toronto's St. Michael's Hospital, who works with the Gift of Life Foundation, will be at the Walk - which begins at Coronation Park (across from the CNE's Princes' Gates) and finishes with the RioCan Festival at Ontario Place - to register as many Jewish adults, 18 years and older to a bone marrow registry. According to Dr. Arbess, there is not enough Jewish representation in the worldwide bone marrow registry and he is seeking to remedy that problem.

"We need to see this as a Jewish issue," Dr. Arbess explained. "This is a Jewish health issue because there is a shortage of Jewish bone marrow donors. We need to increase our database and the Walk is a fantastic place to reach a lot of Jews all in one place."

Over 50 volunteers will work along side Dr. Arbess at the RioCan Festival to register as many people as possible. Last year, over 230 people stopped by Dr. Arbess' booth to have their cheeks swabbed. The worldwide bone marrow registry now includes roughly 8 million donors but only 300,000 Jews.

"It really just takes a few minutes to potentially save a life," Arbess said. "I'm proud of what we do, and we will continue to get as many people as possible involved."

Another personality who will be on hand at the RioCan Festival is Michael "Pinball" Clemons, coach of the CFL Grey Cup champion Toronto Argonauts, who officially signed on as a spokesman for this year's UJA Federation's Walk with Israel 2005.

"It is wonderful to see Toronto's Jewish community come together to celebrate Israel, year after year at the Walk with Israel," Clemons said. "I know that teamwork is important to being successful and I am proud to join an already great team in the Walk with Israel."

"Pinball" will be on hand to greet walkers at the event, as they enter Ontario Place for the RioCan Festival, which also boasts an Israeli shuk (marketplace). The shuk offers Walk participants a place to celebrate, eat, relax and hang out once the Walk has been completed. This year, among the many interesting attractions people will be able to purchase Israeli products, Judaica, crafts and kosher sushi.

"The shuk is so much fun," 11-year-old Sam Strelshik said, "There's a lot to do and the cotton candy is great; it's just what you need after a long walk."

For further information about how to become a vendor at the shuk contact Michelle Golfman @ 416-631-5854. Visit the Walk's website at www.ujawalkwithisrael.com

The anguish of Sderot

City traumatized by rocket attacks

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA Federation

Every week, Itzik Ohayon lights a memorial candle on a quiet street in Sderot, where a Palestinian rocket attack killed his three year old son, Afik, less than a year ago. It's across the road from Afik's kindergarten. Here, many of his classmates still remember what happened and talk lovingly about their lost little friend.

Itzik Ohayon and Afik's mother, Ruti Zahavi's sorrow is the anguish of Sderot, a working class city of 20,000, just half a kilometre from the Palestinian Authority's Gaza strip. The community, which is not a Gaza region Jewish settlement about to be evacuated, will soon be celebrating its 50th anniversary in a fearful atmosphere. Sderot has become the favorite target of Kassam rockets launched by Palestinian terrorists, and the city's mayor, Eli Moyal, fears the situation will worsen once Israel's disengagement from Gaza is complete.

Since the fall of 2000, over 600 missiles have hit the city - with only a 20 second warning - killing 10 residents. The indiscriminate attacks have compounded Sderot's social and economic problems, which assistance from UJA Federation-supported services have helped to relieve. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto raised nearly $25,000 to assist the Sderot community.

"During the height of attacks, no one went to work. Everyone stayed at home," said Moyal. "Small children started to go to sleep with their parents. They refused to go out after sunset. Students in school couldn't really study."

The economic consequences, noted Moyal, have been severe. "No one will buy an apartment here, not even for $10,000 or $20,000 and most people can't afford to move to another city."

As a result, many Sderot residents benefit from a catalogue of programs that range from traumatic stress counseling to employment assistance.

Still, Sderot struggles forward, hoping for a more secure future. "Sderot," said 16-year-old Rotem Yehudai, who recently moved to Beersheba, " is a city of good people who just want to live their lives normally as part of Israel."

International Leadership Reunion

An estimated 200 participants, 58 coming from Toronto, met in Las Vegas recently for the International Leadership Reunion (ILR). The participants - who represented 13 countries at the reunion - all have committed $250,000 to their local federations. Speakers included Irwin Cotler, Canada's Minister of Justice and Attorney General, and Nobel Prize-winning scholar Elie Wiesel. RA launches school for shamashim

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Rabbinical Assembly of Canada has established what is in all probability the first ever School for Shamashim. Classes will begin in Toronto this summer.

Formerly, any synagogue wanting a shamash could easily find a Jewishly knowledgeable, older European immigrant to fill the role of Torah reader, lay religious leader and/or bar and bat mitzvah teacher, said Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum, dean of the new school. Now, he said, it's more common for people to learn on the job.

The School for Shamashim will be based at Beth Tzedec Congregation, where Rabbi Tanenbaum is one of the clergy.

Certification by the Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region – of which Rabbi Tanenbaum is immediate past president – will follow a program that is just over a year long, beginning with four weeks of classes the first summer and ending with four weeks of classes the following year. There is a supervised internship in between, as well as assigned readings and six group teleconferences.

The fledgling school had, as of mid-April, about half a dozen students signed up, with about half of them from the United States. All are from the Conservative movement, although the school is open to men and women from all denominations.

Material covered in the formal classes range from Correcting Mistakes for Torah Reading and Tying Tzitzit to Record Keeping and People Skills. Along with Rabbi Tanenbaum, faculty includes Rabbi Wayne Allen, spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue; Rabbi David Bauman, assistant rabbi of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue; and Lorne Hanick, ritual director of Beth Tzedec.

Rabbi Allen, who originally proposed the idea, said that such a school would provide "an important contribution to Jewish communal life in general, and to Jewish communal life in Canada in particular.

"In Canada, it's becoming increasingly difficult to attract Jewish professionals," he said, citing not only the lower value of the Canadian dollar relative to the American dollar, but also lack of familiarity with Canada. As well, he noted, smaller Jewish communities without clergy still require leadership and "skilled people to handle some ritual. To create a school here would help address those issues."

He added that organizers are "looking to raise the level of competency in the area of Jewish ritual. Whether students intend to go into this as a profession or not, it offers exposure to a field of study they're not going to get at any other place."

Duties of ritual directors include "everything that goes with the running of the minyan," said Rabbi Tanenbaum.

Rabbi Allen said that prospective students should be familiar with the prayer service and synagogue life, and have a working knowledge of Hebrew.

Tuition for each summer is $1,000 (US), with Canadian dollars at par for this year.

Jewish Life

Disengagement and democracy

Guest Voice

By MARC GOLD

"Disengagement..." It sounds almost antiseptic, devoid of feeling and absent of any human emotion. Yet in the context of the planned Israeli withdrawal from Gaza and parts of the West Bank scheduled to occur this summer, the term fails to convey the human trauma associated with the voluntary uprooting of families who have made their homes in Gaza for generations.

Indeed, it is virtually impossible for us, as Canadians, to relate to the anguish this planned displacement has generated and the gut-wrenching, painful debate it has provoked within Israel and the Jewish world. In a very real sense, this innocuous phrase is a code word for a transformational development occurring within Israel that will define the character of the Jewish state for many years.

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) board of directors recently returned from a four-day series of meetings in Israel. The meetings take place annually to provide CIC leadership with an opportunity to meet with Israeli and Palestinian opinion leaders and politicians, as well as our representatives at the Canadian embassy and the representative office in Ramallah. At the meetings and encounters, the issue of disengagement dominated the agenda. We were struck by the unparalleled passion everyone brought to the discussion and the universal recognition that this initiative represents a watershed event for both Palestinians and Israelis.

Ironically, although the very notion of a unilateral Israeli disengagement from Gaza was born out of the failure of the Oslo peace process and the violence that erupted thereafter, from which Israel had to extricate itself and protect its citizenry, "disengagement" has come to be viewed by many as an essential underpinning of any progress toward peace. The CIC accepts this "de facto" characterization, despite the absence of any meaningful reciprocity on the part of the Palestinian Authority and credible intelligence warnings that various Palestinian factions might resume terrorist attacks after Israel leaves Gaza. If there is any chance that the disengagement plan will move Palestinians and Israelis closer to peace, we should err on the side of optimism. Similarly, if ever there was an opportunity for Palestinians and their supporters to take bold steps to reassure Israelis, now is the time.

There is, however, an even more compelling rationale for extending support for the initiative of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's government – painful as it may be for substantial segments of Israeli society. Reduced to its very essence, this is a debate about the legitimate exercise of authority and a society's commitment to the basic principles of democracy. An elected government has advanced an initiative that benefits from both majority support in cabinet and majority support in the full Knesset. Moreover, numerous polls indicate roughly 70 per cent of Israelis support the disengagement initiative.

Opposition is, to be sure, an indispensable element of democracy and minority positions must be acknowledged. Ultimately, however, the acid test is the form this opposition takes. Israeli political culture and Israel's relationship with Diaspora Jewish communities have always been strengthened by the open exchange of diverse perspectives. There are, however, strict parameters of acceptable behaviour, defined in this instance largely by violent versus non-violent protest against the disengagement.

The immediate implications of this dichotomy relate to Israel. We cannot afford to be sanguine about just how difficult and traumatic the disengagement process will be. There is no historical precedent for the kind of displacement planned in Gaza this summer. Three and four generations of families have lived in these communities. All they have built must be abandoned, inherited in many cases by the families of those who fired rockets or launched terrorist attacks against these same communities over the last four years. Their anguish must be validated and their pain assuaged – but never at the expense of safeguarding the sanctity of the democratic values that shaped Israel.

The larger context of this debate reaches well beyond Israel. To the extent that the entire region is moving toward the development of democratic institutions, Israel's ability to reaffirm the democratic principles upon which the Jewish state is founded underscores the power of democracy and its capacity to help a society navigate through the most difficult and challenging of times.

With any luck, and with this example of Israel's commitment to democracy as inspiration, Canadians have reason to hope that these same values will shape and define the character of other countries in the Middle East in the months and years ahead.

The greatest challenge facing students

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Walking the streets of Jerusalem last summer, it occurred to me how circumscribed is much of our Diaspora thinking and teaching about Israel, especially in classroom settings.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The Israel of the Galut imagination swings between an obsessive focus on violence and suicide bombers or equally dramatic paeans to the land's sacredness and the coming of the redemption. It often seems that the very essence of the Israeli miracle – its creation of a normal way for a Jew to practise Judaism – can easily become obscured. In Israel, Jewish life is not just a book-learning culture or a beleaguered enclave against gentile political dominance.

And what struck my children about Jerusalem at the same time that their dad was musing his abstractions? The fact that the Pizza Hut there is kosher, an ostensibly insignificant if cute observation on the one hand, but yet almost straight to the heart of the matter in a different sense. In Israel, Jews can largely eat kosher food wherever they want without thinking, Jewish holidays are national events, corrupt politicians are Jews, the tough-looking macho man with the gun is a Jew and the religious strand is woven seamlessly into many a street- corner or idle conversation. In sum, it is Jewish life lived organically.

But Israel – for reasons easy to imagine – is also a troubled country, one that we dare not distort through fantasies of omnipresent holiness and 24/7 spiritual ecstasy without also failing to perceive its serious secular-religious rift and the tremendous crisis regarding what has been referred to ad nauseam as the post-Zionist malaise. But often the only Israel that many Diaspora Jews cling to or envision, out of love or guilt or habit, is the one under attack by the Arabs, and this has serious educational consequences.

One byproduct of this intense focus on the intifidah and the war against terrorism is that much energy in Diaspora education has been devoted to raising the alarm about the necessity of training students for their potential encounters with opponents of Israel, either in the media or on campus.

This is an important task. But in the case of Canadian Jewish university students, is an inability to respond to potential Palestinian propaganda or being uncomfortable with certain professors in Middle Eastern studies departments really the greatest challenge that they face? Or is the daily encounter with thousands of attractive and interesting non-Jewish peers, and the persistent lure of inter-dating, a far more prevalent dilemma?

Is the deeper frustration an inexperience in discussing the finer points of the Arab-Israeli conflict, or is it the fundamental difficulty for many young Jews to answer or even raise for themselves the deepest questions of Jewish existence: what is our destiny as a nation? For what purpose were we given Torah? What is the particular meaning of Jewish spirituality? How can I best live a committed Jewish life? How does Israel fit into these questions?

The more we reduce the Jewish identity of high school and university students to a matter of inoculating them for the inevitable political discourse of the academy (read: the left is in charge), the more we misdiagnose the real problem and thus avoid its resolution.

Jewish Life

Bellow's work will endure

Books
Bernard Baskin

Saul Bellow was, without doubt, the most-celebrated Jewish writer of his generation.

He was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1976 and was the only writer who won the National Book Award three times – for The Adventures of Augie March (1953), Herzog (1964) and Mr. Sammler's Planet (1970).

How many American writers have published first-rate, well-realized, imaginative books for almost half a century? How many can match his output of 11 novels, two collections of short stories and a clutch of seminal essays and articles?

The Nobel Prize citation praised his "exuberant ideas, flashing irony and burning compassion." It continued, "Modern man in his fiction keeps trying to find a foothold during his wonderings in our tottering world, one who can never relinquish his faith that the value of life depends on his dignity, not his success."

In his response, Bellow insisted, "The need for literature to encourage the belief that the good we hang onto – in the face of evil so obstinately – is no illusion."

Bellow was born in Lachine, Que., soon after his parents emigrated from Russia. He wrote, "My life in Canada was partly frontier, partly the Polish ghetto, partly the Middle Ages… I was brought up in a polyglot community, with Hebrew, Yiddish, French and English." When Bellow was nine, his family moved from Montreal to Chicago, where he went to the University of Chicago and graduated from Northwestern University in sociology and anthropology.

In Herzog, perhaps his best-known and most-celebrated novel, Bellow depicts an intellectual professor who searches his memory for solutions to his and the world's problems.

He writes letters, which he never mails, "to everyone under the sun," including Nietzsche, Spinoza and Eisenhower – even God. They need to know what it is to be human. Philosophers do not know it, but a novelist can show us (in Herzog's words) "the strength of a man's virtue or spiritual capacity measured by his ordinary life."

In Mr. Sammler's Planet, a 70-year-old Polish Jew who has survived the Holocaust is surrounded by young people, mostly relatives, who test his ability to live moderately and wisely. He ends up finding a place for himself in an uncertain society in the late 1960s.

Seize the Day (1956) is a tightly elegiac novella begun in the '40s. Tommy Wilhelm's penchant for success without hard work, his willingness to depend on his father, and Dr. Tamkin's cure-all advice to "seize the day" result in defeat. Though Tommy is a sloppy sentimentalist, a shlemiel, he is a worthwhile and likable man whose breakdown can be seen as a portent of a new beginning.

Bellow has resisted the label "Jewish American writer" as "intellectually vulgar, unnecessarily parochial."

"I'm well aware of being Jewish and also of being American and being a writer. But I'm also a hockey fan, a fact which nobody ever mentions."

One test of Bellow's Diaspora Jewishness took the form of a three-month Israeli sojourn in 1975, an effort few American authors have made. He wrote, "I listen carefully, closely, more closely than I've ever listened in my life." Here, "you cannot take your right to live for granted." Throughout, Bellow takes empathic, yet balanced, views and finds what's lacking in America: "Life in Israel is far from enviable, yet there is a clear purpose in it." He is "heartsick about leaving" but titles his 1976 account of this journey, significantly, To Jerusalem and Back.

Bellow, as writer, will not soon die. Much of his work remains pertinent, intellectually stimulating and Jewishly infused – a panoramic depiction of an age of turbulence and confusion desperately reaching out for life-enhancing values.

March of the Living

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In 1988, Avraham Hirschson had a dream. To help stem the growing tide of Holocaust denial, the member of Knesset would encourage Jewish high school students to learn about their heritage by visiting historic Jewish and Holocaust sites in Poland. That would be followed by a week-long experience in Israel. Hirschson's idea evolved into the March of the Living, an annual trek in which over 100,000 people have retraced the three kilometres between the Auschwitz and Birkenau concentration camp complex. [www.mol2005.org/about/history_vision.asp]

Although nothing could compare to being on the March, former participants have created some excellent websites that put into word, picture and song what it is like to be on the March of the Living. As this year's participants make that trek this week, here's a look at some of those sites.

"When I began seeing the gas chamber exhibits at the Auschwitz museum I wanted to live for those who have passed away before me, and for those who will not be here much longer." Gila Ward was 16 when she went on the March of the Living. Her entire essay can found online. [www.du.edu/~s ward/Poland.htm]

Rachel Block was 17 when she set foot in the camps. "I could not believe my eyes when I saw the pits that people were thrown into in a forest near Treblinka. The tears just kept coming and my heart just kept aching. I said some Psalms for the lost souls…" [http:// tinyurl.com/bfstd]

For a different perspective, I recommend the essay written by Marcin Szydzisz of Wroclaw, Poland, who was a member of a college-aged group that included Poles and visiting Jews. [http://hatikvah.uni.opole.pl/EN-Themarch.htm]

The Canadian site [www.marchoftheliving.org] has three songs that set the tone for the March including a full rendition of the haunting Eli, Eli, and a short excerpt of the Song of the Ghetto Partisans. [http://tinyurl.com/begov] These sites also have excellent educational and other background material if someone you know is considering joining the March in the future.

As for this year's March, a record 18,000 participants representing more than 40 countries are expected including Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Polish President Aleksander Kwasniewski who will be marking his third March. This year's event coincides closely with the 60th anniversary of V-E Day and will also honour those who fought to liberate Europe from the Nazis. [http://tinyurl.com/b7gux]

Former March participant Sarah Guzick says the voyage had a profound effect on her, too. After she returned, she broke up with her non-Jewish boyfriend and became involved in Holocaust education. More than six years after the trip, although she found the experience "generally worthwhile," she feels that the March emphasizes a "cult of persecution" rather than "exploring the more positive reasons to be a Jew."

In her 1998 article "Mistakes of the March," Sarah Schnitzer spoke to alumni who felt the program was too emotionally charged, particularly for high school students. Despite those criticisms, Schnitzer states that virtually all the alumni she interviewed felt the program should continue. [www.shmoozenet.com/jsps/stories/1098Shira.shtml]

Can going on a two-week trip to Poland and Israel really change someone? That's what sociologist William Heimreich of the City University of New York wanted to find out. In his study, Long-Range Effects of the March of the Living on its Participants, people who had been part of the earlier programs were surveyed to see if it had changed their lives. Heimreich told the Jewish Telegraphic Agency that "people who went to the March long ago report that even 12 years later, the march had a very, very powerful impact on them." He suggests that former participants are less likely to intermarry and more likely to provide their children with a Jewish education. Heimreich does acknowledge that people who choose to go on the March are probably more likely to be involved in Jewish concerns. [http://tiny url.com/3lqwd] You can download the study and read it in its entirety. [www.mol2005.org/docs/Heimreich-MOL-Study-2004.pdf]

Reality of war hit Canadian home front

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Though they didn't share the hardships of soldiers on the front lines, Canadians on the home front could not avoid the reality that their nation was at war.

In addition to the domestic political turmoil engendered because of the war's unpopularity in Quebec – as evidenced by what came to be known as the Conscription Crisis of 1944 – Canadians felt the war's consequences through food rationing, air raid drills, letters from the front and an almost Israeli-like obsession with the news.

V-E Day

At North Toronto Collegiate, near Yonge and Eglinton, students could not help but know that Canada was at war, recalled Miriam Chinsky, a graduate of the school and a CJN freelancer.

As she relates in her book The Tailor's Daughter: Growing Up in North Toronto, the school's principal, F.H. Wood, was a colonel with the Queen's Own Rifles Reserve and he created his own quasi-military atmosphere in the school.

Dressed in their school uniforms, students marched around the outdoor track; girls performed military-like drills; youngsters studied Morse code and first aid; and boys took part in target practice in the school basement.

Students also learned to identify enemy aircraft. Chinsky can still rattle off the names of German fighters and bombers, such as the Messerschmidt, Junker and Focke Wolfe.

As members of a war service club, she and her friends would send candy, cigarettes and other tastes of home to soldiers overseas. They were also pen pals with young soldiers overseas, some of them only a few years older than the students at North Toronto.

The letters, Chinsky recalled, were often filled with soldier's bravado, but some wrote about the uselessness of war and of the gruesome sights they had seen.

Aileen Romberg, who was 10 at war's end, recalled shortages of food and other staples. She remembers the mandatory blackouts and her father serving as a neighbourhood warden, ensuring that everyone in her Sunnyside neighbourhood complied.

The true nature of military conflict hit close to home for many at the school, Chinsky said. Because many students were the children of World War I veterans who had a deep affinity with the British Empire, large numbers enlisted early.

Miriam Chinsky

"Boys in my school were killed, boys in my class," she said.

One young man was shot down over enemy territory and lost a leg. The school's star quarterback lost a leg in Italy. Another, who had shipped out with adolescent acne on his face, was reported missing in action and was never heard from again. Another became an officer and was killed in Europe. One of the teachers, slightly older than the students, was killed in action.

Joe Chinsky, Miriam's husband, who had attended Northern Collegiate just down the road from North Toronto, enlisted in the RCAF and was stationed in Torquay, in the south of England.

Because of poor eyesight, he was assigned to a desk job, but his best friend, Samuel Kwinter – the son of Naftuly Kwinter, who was known for his butcher shop at the corner of Spadina and Baldwin – became an RCAF Flying Officer. He was shot down over Hungary in 1944 as he returned from a bombing mission in Romania. Kwinter had already flown sufficient times to be assigned to ground duty, but he volunteered for yet more dangerous runs.

In The Tailor's Daughter, Chinsky recounted her memories of V-E Day: "At last the day came when the killing stopped. We were sitting in class fidgeting, waiting for the official bulletin. When the announcement boomed over the PA system we jumped up, threw our notebooks in the air and ran out into the sunlight."

Three events to focus on eating disorders

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Celebration of Self, a program on eating disorders sponsored by Eating Disorders of York Region (EDOYR), will be held at Indigo Books, 8705 Yonge St., in Richmond Hill, at 6 p.m. on May 10.

The evening will begin with a candlelighting ceremony to "support, honour and celebrate" those who struggle with an eating disorder, have overcome one, or have lost the battle, organizers said in a release.

Speakers will include Randi McCabe, associate director of the Anxiety Treatment and Research Centre at St. Joseph's Healthcare Hamilton; Traci McFarlane, a staff psychologist with Toronto General Hospital's eating disorders program; and spiritual therapist Viola Fodor.

Indigo will donate 10 per cent of all book sales on that evening to EDOYR.

An open forum on eating disorders, also organized by EDOYR, will also be held on May 12, at 7 p.m., at the Bathurst Clark Resource Library, 900 Clark Ave. W., in Vaughan.

That event will feature Cindy Goodman Stulberg, director of Seasons Eating Disorder Services, and Terry Simonik, a feminist therapist who has worked in the eating disorders community in many capacities.

Anorexia and bulimia, the best-known eating disorders, are the only psychiatric illnesses that can kill their victims. In Canada, an estimated 200,000 to 300,000 people between the ages of 13 and 40 have anorexia, while double that number have bulimia. Around 20 per cent of those affected by either condition will die, either from complications from the diseases or from suicide.

People with anorexia starve themselves to dangerously low weights, due to an intense fear of gaining weight and a distorted sense of body image that makes them think they are fat, even if they are seriously underweight. Signs of the disorder include excessive exercising, obsessive dieting, loss of menstrual periods, strange food-related behaviours, depression, and hair loss.

With bulimia, people binge uncontrollably on large amounts of food, sometimes thousands of calories at a time, and then purge the calories through self-induced vomiting, laxatives, diuretics, enemas, or excessive exercise.

Frequently, people have both illnesses at the same time.

EDOYR is a not-for-profit organization that was founded in 2004 by friends and families of people with eating disorders when "it became clear that York Region had very little in programs, support, information or resources for those who are affected by eating disorders," the group said in a release.

It offers support groups, community outreach, education and, especially, hope to those affected. For more information, visit www.edoyr.com, e-mail info@edoyr.com, or call 905-737-8000.

In Toronto, Family and Friends Against Disordered Eating (FADE) will hold what it describes as "an afternoon of speeches, music, poetry and reflection" on May 15 at Toronto's Metro Hall, at 55 John St., from 2 to 3:30 p.m. The program will include a candlelight vigil.

USDS students to join seniors in Holocaust memorial service

More than 70 students from United Synagogue Day School will join seniors at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living for a Holocaust memorial service on May 6.

The two groups are holding the service in an attempt to strengthen the bonds between seniors and youth and keep the memory of the Holocaust alive.

"As a Jewish community, we have a brief opportunity to learn from the witnesses of the Holocaust who are still here to share their intense experiences," said Esta Wall, executive director of the centre.

"We are very excited, and the children have been enthusiastically rehearsing," said Kathy Friedman, principal of United Synagogue Day School, Richmond Hill campus.

"This is an opportunity for our students to not only learn about this significant event in our history, but to also create their own memories with Holocaust survivors in our community."

The Bernard Betel Centre modified its annual Holocaust service – 250 survivors belong to the centre – to include students.

Choirs from both groups will perform, and Helen Schwartz, a survivor will speak about her experiences on behalf of The Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation.

BJCC launches Parkinson's support group

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A Parkinson's disease support group being launched by the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre's special needs department is modelled after the centre's 15-year-old stroke recovery group.

Janet Klein Slavin, who oversees both groups as supervisor of the BJCC's fifty-five plus department of adult services, says the Parkinson's group will include such components as exercise and relaxation techniques, as well as social and educational activities.

"It's not a medical environment. Participants [who are either newly diagnosed or have been living with Parkinson's] will take part in activities in a friendly environment in which members can interact socially.

"We're taking what we do at the stroke recovery group – it meets three times a week – and adapting it to the particular needs of people living with Parkinson's disease. They'll be able to talk to each other and know they're not alone," Klein Slavin said.

Family of group members can use the community centre facilities at the same time the group meets, she said, "so they can all be here at the same time."

To spread the word about the new group, Klein Slavin said she has contacted doctors' offices and posted information on the BJCC website.

As well, an information meeting is being held on May 16, 7:30 p.m., in room 211 of the BJCC.

For information on joining the group or to volunteer, call Klein Slavin at 416-636-1880, ext. 259.

Bridge, mah-jong program to raise funds to fight ovarian cancer

The second annual Mindy Kirsh Memorial Bridge to The Cure is set to take place May 10, 11 a.m. at the Spirale Banquet and Conference Centre.

Organizers say the bridge and mah-jong luncheon is expected to raise $60,000 for ovarian cancer research at The Princess Margaret Hospital.

The event, which is attracting an estimated 350 people, is in memory of Mindy Kirsh who died two years ago at age 52.

"I am so proud of what we are accomplishing," says event co-chair Taube Zeifman.

"Our goal is to ensure that Mindy's life will continue to make a difference. And thanks to all the participants and sponsors, we should raise double the proceeds from our inaugural year."

In addition to the event, organizers have also been selling ovarian cancer lapel pins.

"People are snapping them up as quickly as we can order them. We have sold more then 1,500 in just over a month."

Statistics from the Canadian Cancer Society state that an estimated 2,270 Canadian women will be diagnosed with ovarian cancer this year, while 1,450 will die from the disease.

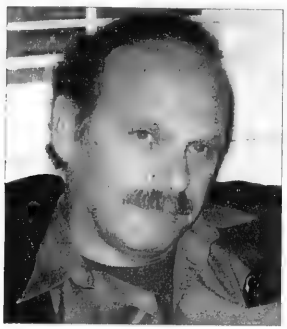
U.S. scholar wins $1.4M grant to teach at York U

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

York University has snagged one of the world's leading scholars of modern Asian studies.

Joshua Fogel, whose work focuses on the importance of Japan in China's modern development, will arrive in Toronto in July after winning a $1.4 million grant from the Canadian government.



Joshua Fogel

Fogel, an American from the University of California in Santa Barbara, will teach and conduct research at York.

He has signed a seven-year renewable contract with the university.

The grant enables York to create a new chair in Asian studies Fogel will fill.

"The creation of this chair builds on York's research strength in international studies and our specific regional strength in Asia Pacific," said Stan Shapson, the university's vice-president of research and innovation.

Born in Brooklyn in 1950, the son of a criminologist and pre-school teacher, Fogel has been at the University of California since 1989.

He has also taught at Harvard and Columbia University.

Fogel, who knows Hebrew and Yiddish, is the author of several books and innumerable monographs on China and Japan.

In an interview, he said, "My interest first spiked in 1970 when I was in college. I took a course or two on contemporary China, which then meant the years of the Cultural Revolution. I was smitten. As I learned more about the Cultural Revolution and China's policies, I became ever more interested in Chinese history."

Japan is very important in China's development, he explained.

"In the early years of the 20th century, Japan was the primary place for Chinese students to acquire a 'modern education.' The principal architects of the 1911 revolution that toppled China's last monarchy were trained there.

"Japan provided China with a model for an East Asian society wanting to shed its traditional trappings and rapidly try to reach parity with the encroaching west."

Today, Japan is one of China's largest trading partners, and Japanese companies have invested heavily in the Chinese economy, Fogel added.

Currently, he is working on two closely related books.

"One is on the first modern mission from Japan to China in 1862. The other is on the first modern expatriate community of Japanese in Shanghai, from 1862 to 1895."

Fogel said he learned Hebrew as a child and returned to it while teaching at Harvard. He picked up Yiddish at Columbia after finishing his Ph.D in history in 1980.

He is glad to be coming to Canada.

"One of the attractive things to me and my family about moving to Toronto is having a full-fledged Jewish community, something (my wife) and I both have missed. We look forward very much to that."

By ALIZA LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

When a small group of high school students decided they wanted to try something different six years ago, Bnei Akiva, the international religious Zionist youth group, was known for being a fun place for Zionist kids to socialize. A group of Grade 12 students tried to kick-start a weekly Torah study program that year, but could only get five or six students to show up every week, Arye Sokol remembers.

"Two years ago, we struggled to get a minyan [of 10]," the University of Toronto student says, surveying the packed room with pride. "This year we get 70 people a week."

The program's premise is simple: high school students get paired up with university students and learn in pairs and small groups. They come for an hour of group study, a brief speaker, the evening prayer Ma'ariv and refreshments. Not where you'd expect to find a student when prime time TV is on. But this year, the popular program has swelled far beyond expectations.

The high school students who come every week often finish their classes as late as 5 or 6 p.m. The university students come during midterms and even during exams. Most can't imagine doing otherwise.

Sara Yeres, an Ulpanat Orot student in Grade 12, says that when she walks into the room full of high school students learning together, "it's uplifting and it makes it fun. It's nice to come to a place where learning is not for marks and it's a positive atmosphere." She, along with Sokol and two other students, co-ordinate the weekly program, which is called Beit Midrash, or "house of study." Together with U of T student Sara Greenwood and Or Chaim student Ezra Javasky, they are responsible for creating the atmosphere of a house of study, something they attribute to the students who have begun to come in large numbers this year.

The program's vibrancy depends on older students drawing in younger ones, which is how Ulpana Grade 9 student Chaya Solomon was recruited this year.

"My older brother and older sister came [weekly in previous years]," she says, "so I decided to come, too." Solomon, who says that she appreciates the opportunity to study Torah without being tested on the material, is like Yeres and Javasky in that respect – they too began attending because their older siblings did.

The record numbers of students have posed a challenge for the organizers, who hold the program weekly at the centrally located Congregation B'nai Torah. For each new student who comes, the organizers have to find a regular study partner or group. Duos have become trios and groups of three now have five or six studying everything from Bible to Talmud to Jewish philosophy.

In addition to pairing up people with study partners, the organizers line up a weekly speaker, and over the years have hosted scores of interesting people, such as Rabbi Charles Grysman from Netivot Hatorah Day School and Zichron Yisroel Congregation in Thornhill, Rabbi Glenn Black from National Conference of Synagogue Youth and Martin Lockshin, director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies.

Some weeks, the students themselves do the speaking, Javasky says, while other times, it's the Bnei Akiva shlichot Ayala Shalev and Avital Goddard who share brief words of Torah. Javasky, a Grade 11 student, says that his favourite speaker was York student Noam Lockshin, who spoke about the lesson to be learned from aggadic passages in the Talmud.

And the studying isn't confined to the weekend. Due to popular demand, the four organizers, collectively known as the "Beit Midrash crew," have begun Torah study weekly e-mails, journals for the holidays of Chanukah and Pesach, and they are planning, along with a lot of alumni, to complete the entire Torah, Mishnah and Nezikin, the section of the Talmud that deals with damages, in time for their all-night Torah study program on Shavuot.

After a year of such tremendous growth, Bnei Akiva has its work cut out for next year, but the students say they are excited to just be doing what they're already doing.

"It makes me proud to be a part of this," Yeres says.

Aliza Libman is a fourth-year religious studies and education student at York University. She has been studying Talmud at the Bnei Akiva Beit Midrash for three years.

If not now, when?

By SHELLEY MILLMAN HERMAN

As we take our leave from the acute sense of freedom that we experience during the eight days of Pesach that commemorate our liberation from slavery in Egypt, we step forward into our current reality, feeling a sense of joy and hope that energizes us. The time of Passover – appropriately – coincides with the season of hope, the beautiful spring season that fills everyone with a sense of anticipation, with the budding trees symbolizing growth and renewal. After a period of winter barrenness, there is a stirring of life that ushers in a new beginning that we are all eager to embrace.

Why is it then that we also leave the eight-day cycle of freedom with a sense of sadness? Our hopeful joy is tainted by our longing and deep angst for something more. Is it that we are fearful of something – perhaps of ourselves, and the vice-like grip of our personal faults and diehard habits that we are enslaved to?

We have now entered the 49 days of sefirah that lead us up to the holiday of Shavuot – the time when we are to become most elevated in order to merit receiving the Torah.

Now is the time to reflect on what it is that entraps us. Is it our own self-defeatist attitude that allows our negative inclination to continue to tie us to the many things we wish we could overcome? When will we finally make legitimate strides towards personal change? When we are 40, 50 or 60 years old – is that when we will finally "grow up"? Or perhaps we should wait until we are 70, when we can comfortably state that we are already too old and set in our ways to ever be able to change.

At this time of year, as we move closer to the receiving of the Torah, our souls cry out for us to become better people, better Jews, better individuals. Waiting for some intangible set of circumstances to happen before we improve who we are is a sad waste of valuable time that we never get back. We have to change the way we do things, and only we know exactly what those things are that we must change. Is it loving our children more, or loving ourselves more, or loving God more, or loving life more? Now is the time to contemplate how we want to grow, and we must move from contemplation to action. Do we talk too much, waste time too much, eat too much, yell too much, worry too much, take things for granted too much?

In preparation for Shavuot, let's change one thing, just one thing, but really do it. Let's focus on it for a whole year, until next erev Shavuot, when we will be ready to move onto the next item to change in our "to do" list for life. Our life. Now is the time to grab hold and climb higher.

About 100 grade 7 and 8 students from Leo Baeck Hebrew Day School will attend the launch of Hopes, Wishes and Dreams, a book published by the Teresa Group, an organization that provides front-line services for children living with HIV/AIDS.

The book, the Teresa Group's second, was funded in part by a $22,000 grant the group received from Ronald McDonald House Charities (RMHC) in October 2004.

The organization's first book, Bye Bye Secrets, was written two years ago by children to discuss the devastating effects of HIV and AIDS on their lives.

Special guest June Callwood will attend the launch to celebrate the publication of the book, the RMHC grant and the support of Leo Baeck students.

The launch will take place May 4, at 10:30 a.m. at Leo Baeck's Thornhill branch, 36 Atkinson Ave.

Media underplay anti-Israel and anti-Jewish incitement

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

Daniel Okrent, the New York Times' "public editor" or ombudsman, devoted his April 24 column to the subject of the paper's coverage of Israel and the Palestinians ("The Hottest Button: How the Times Covers Israel and Palestine").

Okrent dealt with the heated reactions of the Times' pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian readerships, both of whom are convinced that the paper betrays a bias in its news treatment.

Okrent explained some of the standards the Times applies to deal fairly with news coverage. For example, the Times "eschews passion" in an effort to achieve "detachment." However, his account of this detachment concerning the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is peculiar: "The paper's seeming reluctance, for instance, to report evidence of incitement to racial or religious hatred derives in part from a subconscious effort to stick to the non-inflammatory middle and to keep things civil, even when civility leaked out of the conflict long ago."

This is peculiar because it would seem that the function of the news media is first and foremost to describe what is happening as accurately and fully as possible, not to filter out disturbing and pervasive images in an artificial attempt "to keep things civil" when, admittedly, they are anything but.

The Times is not unique in this practice. Most other western media outlets have either ignored or grossly underplayed the extent of anti-Israel and anti-Jewish incitement in Palestinian, Arab and Muslim media, and its effects.

An exception was a CBC documentary, One Is Too Many, about the frightening growth of anti-Semitism in France. It was shown in its full 75-minute length on CBC News: Sunday Morning on April 17.

In one segment, host Carol Off shows a ghastly scene from an anti-Semitic series originally produced in Syria and broadcast in France and elsewhere around the world by Al-Manar, the Hezbollah satellite TV channel. An orthodox Jew appears, saying, "Listen, we want the blood of a Christian child before Passover, for the matzahs." As he cries "Mama, Mama," a young boy is laid on a mat, his throat slit, and a pool of blood appears.

The sickening, graphic detail is hard to watch. Yet CBC viewers see only a few seconds of what one can imagine is a far greater tapestry of blood libel imagery. Off called this "a source of poison in the Muslim community [in France]."

Such images must have a lingering, deeply damaging impact, especially on the minds of young people in the Muslim world.

Off interviewed the French-Tunisian intellectual Abdelwahab Meddeb, who reflected on the impact of such programs: "Images have great power and they create a favourable foundation for ideologues and agitators. From that point of view, there is a huge problem in countries like France and England, where religious ideologues take advantage of the situation to stir the pot.

"I'm very wary of television because I know that it has the power to push people towards perverse ideologies."

And toward terrorism, Meddeb might have added, though this is not discussed in the CBC documentary.

Returning to Okrent's caution against the sort of thing viewers were shocked at in the CBC piece, one might say that shining a light on evil is the best way to help ensure that civility prevails in the long run.

Talking of civility of a totally different sort: Anna Morgan's article, "Reigning on the parade," in the Toronto Star on April 22, provides a rich and nuanced description of the tensions and challenges that prevail in Israel as it prepares to host World Pride, a gathering of gay and lesbian organizations from around the world, scheduled for August in Jerusalem. As a country founded as both Jewish and democratic, "gay rights, like nothing else," Morgan writes, "tests the ability of religion to live within a democracy."

Hamilton police chief faces complaints over Israel trip

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Hamilton's Police Services Board has sent two complaints filed over the city's police chief's recent visit to Israel to the Ontario Civilian Commission on Police Services.

"Both complaints have been referred to the OCCPS," Hamilton police spokesperson Gary Ostofi told The CJN last week, adding that it's "common" for the board to refer complaints to the Toronto-based civilian oversight body.

The complaints over the participation of Hamilton police chief Brian Mullan in the Israel trip were filed by two small local community groups, Community Action Against Racism (CCAR) and Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights.

"It was unwise of [Mullan] even to consider becoming embroiled in this debate at all, much less take a stand favouring one side (the State of Israel) so much," the CCAR complaint states.

OCCPS spokesperson Cathy Boxer told The CJN that complaints to the commission can be dismissed, held pending more information or examined further. If there is sufficient evidence supporting misconduct, the matter is sent to a hearing.

A third complaint over the March 1-8 trip by two dozen Ontario police chiefs and deputy chiefs to study Israeli security has been filed in Ottawa.

In an April 6 letter to the chair of the Ottawa Police Services Board, Linda Belanger, writing on behalf of the local branch of the Canada-Palestine Support Network (Canpalnet), called the participation in the Israel trip by Ottawa's Assistant Chief Larry Hill "a slap in the face to the Arab community" in the city.

Citing a long list of alleged violations by Israel of United Nations resolutions and international law affecting Palestinians, Belanger said Hill's participation in the trip was "ill-advised" and "insensitive."

It was "completely inappropriate," she added, for the junket to be subsidized by Jewish groups, El Al Airlines, and Israel's tourism ministry. Israeli police "should be coming to Canada to learn from our police forces."

The historic trip by the police chiefs was a joint project of the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police, Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. It included former Toronto police chief Julian Fantino, Ontario's community safety minister, Monte Kwinter, and law enforcement representatives from 15 Ontario cities, towns and regions, including the Ontario Provincial Police.

In Israel, they met with high-level politicians and other officials to learn about the latest in security and anti-terrorism measures.

Meanwhile, a Hamilton Spectator columnist who wrote about the complaints in the city is angry that the Police Services Board dealt with the matter in a closed-door meeting, held on April 18.

"It's disgraceful," Bill Dunphy told The CJN. "[The board] is not a place to go to see democracy in action."

He said, however, that the board routinely handles complaints in camera.

The allegations that Mullan was exploited for Israeli propaganda purposes were bolstered by Dunphy in a highly charged column last month that was strongly critical of Israeli policies toward the Palestinians.

> Filed by two small local community groups

Dunphy acknowledged in the column that Mullan's trip had been pre-approved and funded with about $2,000 of local tax money. He also quoted the chief as saying there was no political agenda at work, only a desire to better protect the citizens of Hamilton.

Jewish community leaders in Hamilton called the column "particularly offensive."

In a follow-up column three days later, Dunphy related the harsh feedback he received from readers, including allegations of anti-Semitism.

He also apologized for not including "Jewish voices" in the first column, but he didn't back away from his original argument.

Dunphy told The CJN the controversy has been "useful" because "it's made an awful lot of people examine the issues."

Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber, who organized the police trip, called the complaints "a fraud by marginal groups whose sole aim is to discredit Israel. The police chiefs understand what these groups are doing."

In a letter to the editor of the Spectator, Farber noted that Dunphy's columns did not mention the fact the police chiefs also met with a senior leader of the Palestinian national security force and the legal adviser to the Palestinian Authority.

Farber also asked: "One wonders where Dunphy's outrage was when Mississauga MP Carolyn Parrish and eight other MPs visited the Palestinian Authority and Israel in May 2002, with Palestine House picking up the tab. Are MPs less important or less easily manipulated [than police officers]?"

CJC repeats call to beef up B.C. hate crime team

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — British Columbia's Hate Crime Team needs more money to confront and combat bias and hate-motivated crimes in the province, says Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region (CJC).

That was one of the recommendations that came out of the organization's recently released report titled Public Affairs Action Agenda.

Mark Weintraub, chair of CJC's Pacific region, said that while the Hate Crime Team still exists, its operations have been cut back under Premier Gordon Campbell's Liberal government.

"We're worried that its early gains have been undermined during the last four years," he says.

CJC has noted in the past that as a result of provincial cuts, the unit has not been able to do outreach and education or fill vacant positions, including hiring a data analyst and seconding a Vancouver police officer to join the unit's full-time RCMP officer.

The Hate Crime Team was set up by the previous provincial government. It's made up of specially trained police officers and Crown attorneys with expertise in investigating and prosecuting hate crimes.

The team deals with a broad range of hate-related crimes, including graffiti, assaults and murder, and looks into attacks against minority groups such as Jews, gays, aboriginals and Muslims.

Operations cut back under Liberal government

Its recent work includes investigations into an anti-Semitic column in a Lower Mainland Muslim newspaper, and a call by a local Muslim cleric for jihad.

Weintraub said the team should be training all B.C. law enforcement officials to identify crimes where the intent goes beyond an attack on an individual and becomes a threat to society.

"It needs enough money so, for example, provincial law enforcement personnel have sufficient computer power to monitor, record and analyze data related to hate crimes," he said.

The 64-page Public Affairs Action Agenda is a summary of CJC priorities and will guide the organization's ongoing human rights work for the next three years.

The document identifies six areas of concern: hate and bias crime, hate propaganda, Holocaust education, human rights protection, multiculturalism, and affordable housing.

In addition to a call for more funding for the Hate Crime Team, its recommendations include greater intergovernmental co-operation on monitoring and combating hate propaganda; ensuring that Holocaust education remains part of B.C.'s required education curriculum; establishing an information and advisory office within the provincial human rights apparatus; improved links between multicultural stakeholder groups; and increased funding for affordable housing.

"Implementing these recommendations are key to ensuring the Jewish community lives and thrives in Canadian society, free of anti-Semitism," Weintraub said.

Canada's approach to fighting hate crime has proven to be successful, he added. "Canada today has a lower incidence of hate crime compared to either the U.S. or Europe."

Congress said the report has been sent to Campbell and to NDP leader Carole James.

Calls to Campbell and James, who are in the middle of a provincial election campaign, were not returned.

Incident in Islamic school was isolated: minister

Indeed, there was an air of apprehension in Kingston's small Jewish community in the wake of the affair after the Whig-Standard published the story on its front page. Both Rabbi Daniel Elkin of Beth Israel Congregation and synagogue president Elaine Viner stressed to The CJN that Jews have good relations with area Muslims and Christians and take part in local interfaith initiatives.

Meanwhile, Kennedy announced that a ministry inspection at Ottawa's Abraar school concluded that a student's anti-Israel essay, which resulted in the suspension of two teachers, was isolated.

"This incident was deeply disturbing. However, a ministry inspection has concluded that it was not part of a systemic problem," Kennedy said in a statement.

He commended the school's administration for co-operating throughout the probe, as well as for its "firm commitment to ensure that nothing of this nature happens again."

The two unnamed teachers were suspended following reports of their involvement in the student's project.

The handwritten Arabic text in the sketch read, "With the call of 'God is the Greatest,' the flag of Zionism will fall and will be destroyed."

"Without thinking, Ahmed took his M-16 machine-gun and threw the bombs, and he showered the Jews; this resulted in the killing of the soldiers," the boy wrote in one passage.

"God bless you, your efforts are good," the other teacher wrote on the title page.

No action was taken against the student.

Kennedy noted that the school's board of directors will review his report and inform the ministry and public of any actions they are taking.

The ministry's inspection involved interviews with the principal, reviewing school documents in English and Arabic, including the school's code of conduct, teaching resources, curriculum documents and samples of students' work.

Established in 2000, the Abraar School, with 254 students, "is working to prevent another incident from happening by introducing activities and training for students and staff promoting tolerance," an education ministry statement said, adding that late last month, representatives of the Jewish, Christian and Islamic communities toured the school and visited students in a display of interfaith support.

The ministry noted that there are 576 uninspected private schools in Ontario, and that it does not monitor private elementary schools beyond receiving annual registration and statistical information.

Kennedy said he is committed to review ministry policies concerning private schools.

Canadian Jewish Congress commended Kennedy and said it was encouraged by the quick action of both the ministry and the principal at the Abraar School.

Quebec overseeing management of JEC until care improves

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The executive director of the Jewish Eldercare Centre (JEC) acknowledges that the care of its 320 residents should be improved, but places much of the blame for a highly critical government report on employees who are reluctant to change their routines and attitudes, as well as a perennial shortage of staff, especially registered nurses.

Michel Amar said he recognized the JEC was lacking a "home-like environment" when he assumed his post in June 2001, and said steps to change this had been taken long before the investigation. These included a complete change in the top administrators and a determined effort to eradicate an "entrenched mindset" among staff and have them put residents' wishes ahead of what may be convenient for them.

Over 70 per cent of residents, whose average age is 86, have dementia. The investigation was conducted as a result of complaints from the users' committee, which is currently composed mainly of relatives of residents.

"We still have a lot of work to do… But for us, the quality of life of residents is of the utmost importance and we are committed to making all necessary changes," Amar said.

He added that what was done already was accomplished despite the JEC's having a $1.5-million operating deficit when he came on board. For the past three years, the budget has been balanced, he said.

However, nurse's aide and union leader Ricardo McKenzie said the work schedules are decided by management to "make up for" staff shortages and provide no advantage to the staff. He contends the real problem is a lack of resources, which is common to all public long-term care institutions.

Amar also said the situation is partly due to the difficulties associated with the merger of the Jewish Nursing Home and Jewish Hospital of Hope to create the JEC. This occurred "on paper" in 1995, but in fact only after he was hired.

For six months, the JEC will have an observer, Leonard Vincent, appointed by the Ministry of Health and Social Services, sitting on its board of directors to see that the changes recommended in the report are implemented. He is to report monthly to the minister, Philippe Couillard, on the progress.

In addition, a three-member team, with expertise in management, also from the ministry, are on-site full time for three months.

This was the second investigation of the JEC by the Health and Social Services ombudsman in two years, following complaints from the users' committee about the quality of life and services, and the lack of response from the management and board. The latest report says no concrete improvement has been found since 2003.

This investigation was carried out by three persons who spent a total of 78 hours at the JEC from October to December, spread over all shifts, on weekdays and weekends.

The report cites numerous "major, chronic weaknesses," both administratively and clinically, and emphasizes the lack of "respect and dignity" in handling residents. It describes in detail an "impersonal and infantilizing" care routine, that gives little consideration to what the residents want or to maintaining what capacities they still have.

These include such practices as waking and dressing patients at 5 a.m. and putting them to bed at 5:20 p.m., overuse of restraints, leaving them for hours in a "noisy and depressing" common room in front of a television and a failure to stimulate them or even take them for walks. The report also finds the architecture and physical setting inappropriate. (The JEC's two pavilions were opened in 1993.)

The report said professionals do not intervene enough, caregivers lack adequate training in gerontology, and staff do not work in an interdisciplinary fashion. Another shortcoming noted was that families are not consulted or informed enough.

Users' committee member Laura Blutstein said the report is "right on. For years we've been telling the administration and board that these problems exist, but they were unresponsive and negated them. The report now validates our experiences."

An international organization is seeking a dynamic individual for the position of Community Outreach Coordinator

The candidate will be passionate, creative, have excellent communication and presentation skills, and be cognizant of relevant contemporary issues concerning antisemtism. The candidate is someone who is a self-starter and keenly aware of critical issues concerning the Jewish community.

The candidates' role will include developing links with a variety of organizations and communities; monitoring and responding to trends on Canadian campuses; coordination of educational programs; involvement with international action campaigns and working with social action committees.

V-E Day

War's 'tough days' ended in victory for Canadian soldiers

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

May 8, 1945, V-E Day, is one of those monumental events in world history, the day World War II came to an end in Europe.

Newsreels captured the rapturous joy experienced by millions on the home front. Throngs of civilians and soldiers crowded the streets, strangers kissed, dancers performed impromptu jigs in the street.

But deep in the heart of Europe, where Canadian soldiers fought their way into Holland and northern Germany, the announcement of the German surrender did not necessarily generate those once-in-a-lifetime memories. Many soldiers, fighting on the Canadian army's front lines, knew a few days in advance that their enemy's surrender was imminent. When the news did come, it was, for them, somewhat underwhelming.

By late April, the Red Army had surrounded Berlin, and it was clear that Adof Hitler had decided to take as many Russian and German soldiers and civilians with him as possible. The bloody battle lasted for weeks and hundreds of thousands died. Hitler committed suicide in his Berlin bunker on April 30 and control of the German Reich was turned over to Admiral Karl Doenitz, who would negotiate Germany's unconditional surrender.

In the last days leading up to V-E Day, German resistance had weakened and Canadian officers were told to curtail military action and hold their positions lest anyone become the last casualty of the war.

In interviews with several Canadian veterans, infantrymen, artillerymen and air crew alike, it is apparent that their memories of that otherwise monumental day are hazy. They shrug and shake their heads when asked where they were when they heard of the surrender. They're almost apologetic that their memories are not clearer, more specific than the fuzzy recollections they can bring to mind.

Today, they're not entirely sure what they did to celebrate Germany's surrender and their survival in the crucible of war. For the veterans contacted by The CJN, the end of the war spelled relief as well as a ticket home.

Deeper in Europe, where emaciated and bedraggled Jews were being liberated from concentration camps, May 8 did not necessarily mean immediate freedom. In one camp populated by women slave labourers, a survivor recalls that the women remained behind the camp's barbed wire lest rampaging Russian soldiers mistake them for German women and rape them. For them, V-E Day did not mean a street celebration, nor high spirits. It meant another danger to be averted.

Hy Shulman, now 83, was one of 200,000 Canadians who served in the Royal Canadian Air Force (RCAF). He enlisted in 1941, and by 1944, he was serving as a leading aircraftsman in an "air observation patrol."

His unit arrived in France a few days after D-Day, the June 6, 1944, Allied invasion of continental Europe, and his patrol craft was the Auster, an English version of the American Piper Cub.

Shulman was a mechanic, but he was assigned as an observer in the patrol craft.

"Our role was to spot targets for the artillery and we ended up in Holland," he said.

Taking off from grass fields, the patrol would head for enemy lines and attempt to seek out camouflaged German gun batteries, particularly machine gun nests. Remarkably, they rarely received enemy fire. "They didn't want to give away their positions," he explained.

To this day, he believes his unit did "nothing glamorous. We went where we were sent and did what we were told."

By May 1945, the unit, which consisted of the pilot officer, his batman (driver), a radio operator and an air frame mechanic, was in the town of Vaasen, outside Appeldorn in Holland. A soccer field served as their landing strip and their aerodrome was a truck.

At the time, "we knew the Germans were on the run. We knew it was going to be over, but nobody consulted us."

By the last week of the war, action against the Germans had been curtailed. "We knew something was going to happen," he said.

His recollection of V-E Day is somewhat vague. He's not sure how he learned of it, but he thinks "the brass told us." He does recall that the Dutch civilians "went crazy."

For the Canadian airmen, it was a different story.

"We didn't feel anything," Shulman said. "I mean, we were kids. I was 19 going in [to the RCAF] and 24 coming out. We had a teenage life, we had no responsibility. We were told when to get up and when to go to sleep."

He recalls that after the celebrations, the Dutch exacted revenge on Nazi collaborators. "They grabbed women who had collaborated with the Germans and shaved their heads and paraded them through the city," he said.

The Dutch attitude to the Canadians, however, was the polar opposite. "They appreciated the Canadians because we made a difference in their lives. The Germans were making a hell of their lives, and we chased them out… It was a new lease on life."

In 1945, Ben Kanter was a technical sergeant, gunnery, and a surveying assistant to a gun position officer in the 28th Field Battery of the 5th Field Regiment in the Royal Canadian Artillery. The gun crew were assigned 25-pounders, a field piece known to artillerymen as a "gunhowitzer," a weapon that combined the high-angle fire of a howitzer and the flat trajectory of a field gun.

He arrived in France on D+30, 30 days after the D-Day invasion. It was around that time that Canadian forces were engaged in the bloody battle for Caen, a key French town in Normandy, as well as for Carpiquet, a suburb of Caen that was the site of an airport.

The battle for Carpiquet was a fierce one, Kanter recalled. "We got our baptism of fire, because Jerry [German forces] had the place zeroed in and shelled it constantly, and they still had airpower at the time.

"Those were tough days."

Part of his unit's task was to assign a forward observation officer (FOO) to accompany the infantry in the front line. The FOO would call in artillery support and report back if the shells fell short or long until they found the target. The FOO would also call in Typhoon dive bombers after the artillery had put down smoke on the target, Kanter said.

His unit later saw action in the fighting to close the Falaise Gap, an opening in an Allied encirclement through which German forces escaped that summer.

As Canadian troops fought their way north, the 5th Field Regiment helped liberate Antwerp in September, and beginning in October, it provided artillery support to infantry and other units that fought the Germans in the Scheldt Estuary, a wetlands area west of Antwerp that controlled access to the vital Belgian port.

By that time, Allied supply lines from Normandy were stretched thin and control of Antwerp and its access points promised to alleviate the problem. It took almost two months for Canadian, British and Polish units to clear the Scheldt of German resistance.

The Scheldt "was a dirty battle," Kanter recalled.

According to the website, www.historylearningsite.co.uk, "the campaign to free up Antwerp cost the Allies dear. They had lost 703 officers and 12,170 other ranks killed, wounded or lost in action, presumed dead. Over half of these casualties were Canadian men. However, the capture of Antwerp and the ability to use its port facilities was vital for the Allies as they drove on to Germany."

On Nov. 9, 1944, the 2nd Canadian Corps occupied the Nijmegen bridgehead in Holland and turned it into a winter base. Kanter was stationed in Mook, outside Nijmegen. On Feb. 8, 1945, following "a humongous barrage," Allied units began their winter assault. The Allies crossed the Rhine River into Germany at Emerich, Kanter recalled.

Canadian units fighting in the Hochwald Forest were faced with tremendous small arms fire that practically stripped the branches off trees. They could tell they were not on enemy territory, as buildings in German villages were plastered with signs that said, "Victory or Siberia," he said.

On May 5, his unit set up in its final gun position outside Oldenburg. By then, "we knew the war was over."

At the time, he was serving as a FOO with the infantry and the word going around was "to spare the men, as the war was over."

When the announcement came, "we were pretty well tired out. Getting into Oldenburg was hard work."

Looking back on his emotions that day, Kanter said "it was more relief than joy."

Saul Laskin, 86, was a platoon commander in the infantry with the North Nova Scotia Highlanders, a unit in the 3rd Division.

Although a native of Fort William, today's Thunder Bay, Ont., Laskin found himself in the Maritime unit after he lost a coin toss with his best friend, a lad from Halifax. The two had met in "blood and guts training" in Vernon, B.C., and they resolved to stay together. The trouble was, they couldn't agree on a unit – Laskin wanted to join a Fort William regiment, his friend a Nova Scotia unit – hence the coin flip, which Laskin lost.

Saul Laskin

"I was a Jewish officer with the nickname Kelly," he jokes.

As a lieutenant, Laskin was armed with a Browning 9-mm handgun and his batman carried a Sten Gun. At full strength, the platoon consisted of 28 or 29 men, but often they made do with less.

Laskin joined the regiment at Nijmegen, though there were some who landed on D+6. "One kid went through the whole thing, through the whole war and was cleaning a German gun and shot himself," he recalled.

Laskin, whose brother was the late Chief Justice of Canada, Bora Laskin, said near the end of the war, his platoon crossed the Rhine into Germany on pontoons. "The Germans were retreating pretty fast. We were after them.

"There were even times you'd go into a house, and the Germans had just left. We found steaks and pork chops on the stove."

As the war wound down to V-E day, a superior officer told him Germany was about to surrender. Other than that, Laskin doesn't recall the actual surrender. He quickly got tied up in new duties as a quartermaster in a German hospital, as part of the Allied occupation.

"A German superintendent came into the office the first day. He knew I was Jewish and he was shaking like a leaf. In my Yiddish-German I convinced him we were here to bring democracy back to Germany," he said.

Joe Warren enlisted in the RCAF in 1943 and was assigned to Transport Command. A crewman on a DC-3 Dakota as part of 437 Squadron, his unit's task was to tow gliders, drop paratroopers and ferry supplies.

Warren, now 83, accumulated more than 1,000 flying hours during the war and in the months that followed the surrender.

From January to May 1945, his plane "mostly dropped five-gallon jerry cans of

V-E Day

V-E Day bittersweet for slave labour camp survivor

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In the weeks before the German surrender of May 8, 1945, Gerda Frieberg noticed something unusual in the treatment meted out by the reliably cruel SS officer overseeing her labour crew.

An SS Unterscharfuhrer watched as Frieberg stirred a big cauldron of soup, making sure the good parts, the beets and potato peels, rose to the surface so the girls working in the rain would get their share.

Then he went into the kitchen and brought Frieberg other food and said, "Remember, I took care of you. I brought you food."

It was only days before the end of the war and already things had changed at the Etrich factory in Oberaltstadt. The factory, which spun flax into yarn used in making tents and uniforms, ran out of raw material, so the female slave labourers were forced to dig trenches on the outskirts of town.

Frieberg, along with her sister and mother, had spent about three years in a labour camp at the Etrich factory, located in the Sudetenland, the region of Czechoslovakia annexed by Germany prior to the war.

For years, they had survived on the hope of eventual freedom, though Frieberg's best friend, Peppi Schejewitz, 15 and an only child, committed suicide when she learned her parents had been killed in Auschwitz.

It was her promise to Peppi to tell the world what had been done to them that led Frieberg in later years to become an advocate for Holocaust awareness.

In the weeks prior to V-E Day, Allied planes constantly flew overhead, bombing Nazi targets and bringing the war close to home. Then on May 8, with the prisoners' hopes growing, an SS officer at the camp "called us for an assembly, because they loved to count us," Frieberg said.

"He walks to the girls and asks one how old she is. 'Seventeen.' 'Too bad,' he said, 'that's as old as you'll get because we've rigged the camp with dynamite and we'll blow it up before the Russians and Americans can come.'"

With that, he dismissed the girls.

"Imagine, for three years we lived with hope and now our hopes for freedom were dashed," Frieberg said.

Returning to the barracks, they lay down quietly, not sure if they'd live much longer.

The next day dawned quietly. There was no longer the sound of guard dogs barking, but the inmates were "afraid to get up and get blown up," Frieberg said.

Soon they heard the sound of boots marching. It was Allied PoWs, South Africans, who had been interned at a nearby camp. They knew about the work camp and had cut the barbed wire and told them they were now free. They also learned that Czech partisans had cut the detonation wires that the Nazis had rigged around the camp.

"The partisans told us the whole camp would have blown up," Frieberg said.

While much of the rest of the world was celebrating on May 8, they were living in fear of death.

With the knowledge that they were free also came the realization for most of the workers that they were utterly alone.

"I can't describe the mood. Everybody was walking around. Nobody was talking. We didn't know where to go. Most didn't have parents, siblings or a home," said Frieberg, who was 19 at the time.

The workers, most of them young girls like herself, had "grown up" in the camp. They had no education, no money and nowhere to go.

That night, they heard the rumbling of Russian tanks and the next day some of the girls found flowers to throw at the Russian soldiers. As they watched a Soviet unit enter the town, "one guy comes out of an armoured car and said, 'Ivrei? Do you speak Yiddish?'

"'Don't tell the soldiers where the camp is. I've lost control of the soldiers. They are raping all women, no matter who,'" he told them.

With that, the girls headed straight back to the camp and barricaded the doors.

"Now we were afraid of the Russians. That was our liberation," Frieberg said.

The girls saved themselves by posting warnings of typhoid fever on all the doors, not a bluff, since many in the camp did suffer from the disease.

Frieberg and her family managed to avoid the disease, though, like the others, they were plagued by lice and fleas.

As they grew hungrier, they pleaded with the local Czech civilians, who provided them with food.

Only a week or two after V-E Day, the girls decided to leave the camp in groups. Frieberg, her sister and her mother, travelled from Red Cross station to Red Cross station, leaving their names at each one, hoping to find relatives who'd survived the war.

Gerda Frieberg

They hitched rides on trains and on farmer's wagons, and made their way back to their home in the German/Polish border town of Bielszowice. They learned her father had been killed in March, only two months before the liberation, and that 172 members of their extended family had been murdered by the Nazis.

"Except for my mother and my sister, I had no one in the whole world – not a cousin, nobody," Frieberg said.

For Frieberg, May 8, 1945 was a bittersweet day.

"There was no ticker-tape parade, no soldiers returning home as war heroes. We returned home and there was nobody. We came back to a graveyard."

Nevertheless, she said, "it's an important day. It was our victory over the Nazis."

Canadians honoured in Holland as liberators gasoline for fighters." In 1944 the unit was moved from its base in England to one outside Brussels. From there, they flew across Belgium, eventually as far as Oslo and Copenhagen.

On May 8, "we must have been around Brussels in our base," Warren speculates. Like the other veterans, V-E Day does not particularly resonate with him. "Naturally we were really happy, excited, but we just kept on going."

The squadron didn't celebrate. "We were very active. We had to fly the next day."

Immediately after hostilities ended, they were assigned to fly into Salzburg, Austria, and pick up captured British "Red Devil" paratroopers who had been in a PoW camp. They were so weak, Warren said, they weighed between 70 and 90 pounds and had to be helped into the plane.

During the war, while stationed in Britain, Warren and many of his Jewish friends from Toronto would get together during leaves. A lot of his buddies were in Bomber Command, which flew dangerous missions over the heart of Germany. "We had leave every six weeks and we'd go up to see them every time. [I'd hear] this guy's missing, this guy's missing."

He's affected by those losses to this very day. "When things like 9/11 happened, it really bothered me. I break out and cry. Nobody understands the situation where one day you've got all your buddies and the next day they're gone."

Sam Romberg landed in France on D+4, assigned to the headquarters of a squadron of tanks of the 1st Hussars, part of the 2nd Canadian Armoured Brigade.

He had enlisted in 1940 at the age of 17 and had lied to get in.

By the time he arrived in France, the action was heavy and so were the casualties.

"Our unit was the first to get to the targets. We lost quite a few men," he said.

"I got as far as a little town called Ifs," a community a few kilometres south of Caen. His unit was bivouacked there when an air raid took place. "They bombed the living daylights out of us and I was wounded," Romberg recalled.

Romberg was evacuated to a field hospital where shrapnel was removed from the back of his shoulder. After a period of convalescence in France he was reassigned to army general headquarters, by then in Belgium.

Sam Romberg

In May 1945, headquarters had advanced well into Germany, and around the time of the Nazi surrender, he was in the town of Bad-Salzuflen, south of Bremerhaven.

As to the events of May 8 itself, Romberg doesn't remember exactly where he was. "We weren't in the big cities where people went crazy," he said. "We were in our units. It's over, we're glad it's over and that's it," he said.

Romberg recalls his return voyage to Canada more clearly than V-E Day. He had been sent to England on a slow-moving cattle boat in 1941 and had been none the worse for wear. His return voyage to New York was on the Queen Elizabeth, a luxury liner, and he recalls being "sick as a dog for the five-day trip."

From New York, returning Canadian soldiers took a train to Toronto, and when they arrived at the Exhibition grounds, their families were out in force to greet them. That was a big celebration, he recalled.

Even more vivid for Romberg and his wife Aileen, were two visits to Holland in 1990 and 1995, to mark the 45th and 50th anniversary of the country's liberation.

In 1995, Canadian vets were feted to the nth degree, Romberg said. During a parade, he was placed in the lead Canadian tank and they were given chocolates to throw to the Dutch kids, just as they had done during the war.

All through their stay, Canadian veterans were treated like kings. "Strangers picked up checks in restaurants and didn't let us pay," Romberg recalled. "People saluted us if they saw Canadian logos on our clothing."

During the festivities, the Jewish vets wore their berets, which featured a Magen David prominently displayed. A Dutch Jewish woman asked why were we wearing the Jewish star.

"I said, 'I'm Jewish.'

"'I never knew there were any Jews in the Canadian army,'" she said.

"That whole year, 1995, they looked after the Canadians like you wouldn't believe," said Aileen.

"They treated us like kings there," piped in Sam.

Romberg was particularly impressed that the younger generation of Dutch kids were well-informed about the role of Canadian forces in freeing their country from the Nazis. The Canadian liberation is taught in schools and each school is given a section of a Canadian military cemetery to tend. Every week, youngsters visit the cemeteries to make sure the graves are in good condition, he said.

"They know more about what Canada did than Canadians do," Romberg added.

During his 1990 visit to Holland, he and other Jewish vets visited the Groesbeek Canadian War Cemetery near the German border, home to one of two large military cemeteries in the country. During their stay, the vets said Kaddish over about 10 Jewish graves, he said.

According to the Jewish Canadian Military Archives, Jews served in the Canadian forces in greater percentage per capita than any other ethnic group. "During World War II, there were 170,000 Canadian men, women and children of the Jewish faith in Canada, of which 17,000 proudly served in the four branches of Canada's armed forces," the Archives organization states.

Barista turns making coffee into an art

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

There is something inherently tasty about a gourmet coffee called "triple chocolate maple passion."

And after taking a few sips of the drink, which combines two potent shots of espresso, three types of chocolate, maple syrup infused with whipped cream and a smidge of crushed red chili peppers, everything that's enticing about the name is confirmed.

This unique beverage is the brainchild of Stuart Ross, who says he is Toronto's first and only Jewish barista.

"A barista is a coffee bartender," Ross says. "The word originates in Italy, but here I am, a Jewish barista."

Ross explains that baristas aren't coffee brewers, they're culinary artists. Every beverage they prepare is done so with precise detail.

Take a cappuccino sporting a heart-shaped milk design as an example.

Ross's method entails scooping 15 grams of Arabica coffee beans, pressing on them so they are level and then grinding.

Next, the beans are extracted through a brass, made-in-Italy espresso machine, where the science of 120 pounds of pressure and 205 degree water produces two "nectar of gold" espresso shots.

The milk is steamed, stretched and whirled, so that it has a shiny finish.

"Then I pour it into the espresso, delicately enough to get it down under the espresso," Ross relates. "This raises the cream."

The resulting milk forming a heart in the centre of the cup makes you want to simply gaze at the art without drinking. But after adding a web of chocolate swirls, Ross insists on sending the art down the hatch.

And when you do, you have no regrets.

"Some [people say] they've never seen anyone so passionate," Ross says. "It's because of that passion that I'm able to pull that perfect shot of espresso."

Ross's passion and skill have helped him earn bragging rights as central Canada's number 1 barista, following a top showing at the Canadian Barista Championships in February.

A front-page article in the Toronto Star's food section, a number 1 vote in a local magazine and coverage on Omni TV have propelled Ross into the spotlight as the only known latte artist in Toronto.

Long before coffee art became his craft, Ross, 39, was a student of economics, an unhappy stock broker, a salesman of sporting goods and finally, a dog walker.

"I saw the 'For Lease' sign and I thought, 'Wow, I'm going to build an espresso bar here,'" Ross recalls enthusiastically.

He spent six weeks researching the recipe for a successful specialty coffee establishment, and travelled to Seattle for a coffee trade show to learn about the world of baristas.

"I learned this whole new style of making lattes and cappuccinos," says Ross, who trained at Café Vivace in Seattle under the tutelage of famed barista David Schomer.

"I took beginner barista techniques, latte art, and I learned some technical things about the machine. This turned me into the barista I am today."

"Oh my gosh, that looks fabulous," says a fair-haired, 40-something patron, who orders a so-called London Fog, or Tea Latte.

"I don't take any of this for granted," Ross says. "And believe me, the specialty coffee wave is coming to Toronto. Mark my words, in five years, you'll probably have 20 specialty shops to go to."

Turkish PM asks Israel to be patient with Abbas

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan arrived Sunday with a large delegation for his first visit to Israel.

The visit is a resumption of bilateral relations between the two countries, a year after Erdogan condemned Israel's assassination of Hamas leaders.

He was also scheduled to meet this week with Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom and to attend prayers on the Temple Mount before leaving for meetings with the Palestinian leadership in Ramallah.

Recep Tayyip Erdogan

The visit was somewhat marred from a diplomatic point of view when Erdogan refused to cover his head while laying a wreath at Yad Vashem's Hall of Remembrance, which is a consecrated site because the ashes of Holocaust victims are buried there. Erdogan does not cover his head in Turkey either, since that would be contrary to the country's secular nature.

He said Turkey wants to play a role in the peace process, and proposed setting up a Turkish-Israeli-Palestinian working team to examine "how to combat terrorism, preserve the calm and make peace." He offered to invite Peres and Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia to Turkey.

Erdogan asked that Israel be patient and give Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas time to fulfil his security commitments.

"You have to help him more, so that he can succeed in the elections and have the power to meet his commitments," he told Sharon. "You have to be optimistic about implementing the road map, so that terrorism doesn't triumph."

Erdogan said the problems that give rise to terrorism must be understood: "We invest in buying arms but not in preventing the reasons for terrorism."

When Katsav said his words implied sympathy for terrorist motives, Erdogan replied: "Turkey lost 40,000 people in terror attacks. There is not good and bad terrorism. We need to co-operate against it."

In conversation with Sharon, the Turkish leaders decided to strengthen the two countries' intelligence ties to fight terrorism and to establish a direct communication channel between their bureaus.

Sharon told Erdogan that Abbas must decide what he's going to do – follow the road map or negotiate with terror organizations.

"If he opts for talking to them, it won't be possible to move forward with him to implement the road map, and terrorism will resume and be enhanced. The steps he's taking worry me. Only if he acts against terrorism will we be able to assist him."

Sharon said that if an international conference is convened in the future, he would be happy to hold it in Turkey.

Sharansky resigns from government

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli Minister of Jerusalem and Diaspora Affairs Natan Sharansky announced his resignation from the government Monday to protest Israel's failure to make the disengagement plan conditional on democratic reforms in the Palestinian Authority.

"Waiving this condition will weaken the chances of building a free Palestinian society and support terror," Sharansky wrote his letter of resignation, which he submitted to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Monday morning.

Sharansky warned that the plan to withdraw from the Gaza Strip and part of the northern West Bank is a mistake that would make it more difficult to achieve a genuine peace.

"I always saw the disengagement plan as a tragic error, which demands a heavy price from us and also encourages terror," Sharansky said in remarks broadcast on Army Radio.

"The only justification for the existence of the government in its current composition is the implementation of the disengagement plan," said Sharansky. "I don't think I can be a part of the government."

Sharansky will remain a Likud member of Knesset, Army Radio reported.

To Jewish Hungarian Victims of Nazi Persecution and their Heirs
A Class Action Settlement Could Affect You

PROPOSED SETTLEMENT A class action lawsuit, Rosner, et al. v. United States of America, involving personal property looted from Hungarian Jews during the Holocaust is pending in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida ("Court"). A settlement of the lawsuit could affect you if you or your relative might have had property on the Hungarian Gold Train. If the Settlement is approved and you qualify, you may be able to apply for assistance from Jewish social service agencies. Or, you can object to the Settlement by informing the Court of your objections. Or, if you so choose, you can exclude yourself from the Settlement altogether.

WHAT'S THIS ABOUT? The Hungarian Gold Train consisted of twenty-four freight cars containing personal property seized by the Hungarian government during World War II from Hungarian Jews, which was taken into U.S. custody in May 1945 in Austria. The U.S. has agreed to settle claims that it mishandled this personal property. The Settlement is not an admission of wrongdoing or an indication that any law was violated.

WHO'S INCLUDED? You are a Class Member if you are a Jewish Hungarian victim of Nazi persecution who might have had property on the Gold Train, or the heir of such a person.

WHAT DOES THE SETTLEMENT PROVIDE? The U.S. government has agreed to pay up to USD $25.5 million to fund the following three items: (i) approximately USD $21 million for social services that will benefit Jewish Hungarian Nazi victims who are in need (proposed plan will be available on website on June 10, 2005); (ii) USD $500,000 for the collection of documents and artifacts relating to the Gold Train and the looting of Hungarian Jews; and (iii) lawyers' fees and expenses, and incentive awards for Named Plaintiffs, in an amount not to exceed USD $4 million.

WHAT ARE MY OPTIONS? If you stay in the Settlement and are a Jewish Hungarian Nazi victim, you may be eligible for benefits. Even if you are not currently in need, you may stay in the Settlement to allow the funds to assist other Jewish Hungarian Nazi victims who are. You may file comments or objections to the Settlement which will be available for the Court's review prior to any final decision regarding the Settlement by the Court. Unless you exclude yourself from the Settlement, you will be legally bound by it and not able to sue the United States. If you exclude yourself, you will not be eligible for benefits. Any communication related to the Settlement – comment, objection, exclusion request – must be in writing, postmarked no later than August 1, 2005, and conform to specific Court requirements. You may appear through counsel of your choosing at your own expense. An information package from the contacts provided below, describes the specific requirements for such communications.

WHEN WILL THE COURT ACT ON THE SETTLEMENT? The Court will hold a fairness hearing on this proposed Settlement on September 26, 2005, at 10:00 a.m., at which time it will consider whether to approve the Settlement and the lawyers' request for fees and costs.

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION: This is only a summary of a Court-approved Settlement Agreement. The full terms of the Court-approved Settlement Agreement govern. Please check the website for periodic updates on this Settlement at www.HungarianGoldTrain.org. To contact Class Counsel, please email: brent@hbsslaw.com.

To see the full terms, or to request instructions for exclusion from, commenting on, or objecting to the Settlement please go to:
Email: HGT@claimscon.org or Call: 1-800-562-0831

Putin visits Israel, urges Sharon to support Abbas

By ALUF BENN
AND YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — During a historic meeting with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon last week in Jerusalem, Russian President Vladimir Putin called on Israel to support Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas rather than put pressure on him.

"There are two approaches," Putin said. "You can pressure Abbas or you can support him. I believe that you [Israel] prefer to press him. The Arab world tells me that Israel is not fulfilling its promises to assist Abbas. Pressure on him will damage Israel and the Palestinians. The extremists are gaining power and may even get into power."

Putin, who was making the first-ever visit to Israel by a Russian head of state, said that the late PA president Yasser Arafat "did not want to be a head of state, but rather the leader of a revolution. Abbas, however, wants to be the head of a state."

He also told Sharon, "You visited me four years ago and told me about Abbas, whom I did not even know of back then. All your predictions about Arafat and Abbas were accurate."

Putin added that he is "prepared and wants to help Abbas, but not at the cost of Jewish lives."

He said Israel is committed to the "road map" peace plan, but the Palestinians must combat the terror and dismantle terror groups.

Abbas, Putin said, is trying to reach agreements with the terror groups and absorb them into the political system, which is against the road map. "Without the Palestinians meeting all their commitments, there will never be diplomatic progress."

On Friday, Putin met with Abbas and other Palestinian leaders in Ramallah at the end of his three-day visit to the region, and he placed a wreath at Arafat's tomb.

Putin is determined to arm the Palestinians, despite Israel's objections, Palestinian Deputy Prime Minister and Information Minister Nabil Sha'ath told the Saudi newspaper Al Watan.

Palestinian officials said Friday that Putin's plan to give the Palestinian Authority 50 armoured personnel carriers and two helicopters is subject to Israeli approval.

Meanwhile, a Russian official played down Putin's offer to host Middle East talks in Moscow after the suggestion was rejected by Israel and the United States.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said the proposal had been misunderstood, saying the president was thinking only of a meeting of experts rather than a summit.

At their meeting, Sharon and Putin decided to significantly increase intelligence co-operation between Russia and Israel.

"We are strategic allies when it comes to anything to do with [the war on] terror," Putin told Sharon.

He also promised Sharon during their three-hour meeting that Russian weapons will not endanger Israel.

One major issue raised by Sharon during the meeting was Israeli fears that Russian weapons will be sold to Iran and other Arab countries, which could end up in the hands of terror groups.

Putin told Sharon that Israel needs to inform Russia if that were to happen and that he would do everything he could to prevent it.

He also told Sharon that his visit to Israel was meant to mark a new era in relations between Jerusalem and Moscow and to atone for any mistakes made in the past.

Putin also said that "a nuclear Iran worries us just as much as it does you," reiterating a comment he made earlier in the day.

Sharon said at the start of the meeting that he was glad Putin chose to visit Israel so close to the 60th anniversary of the Allies' victory over Nazi Germany.

"The Jewish people and the State of Israel will never forget how the Soviet Union liberated the concentration camps," Sharon said.

He said he hoped Putin's visit will improve relations between the two countries, and then he turned to Putin to say, in Russian, "You are among friends."

Putin arrived in Tel Aviv last Wednesday night for his landmark trip. President Moshe Katsav was the official host of the 40-hour visit.

Another major issue on the agenda for Putin's visit was the planned sale of Russian missiles to Syria, which has caused much concern in Israel.

Putin defended the sale and sought to allay Israeli fears the arms would end up in the hands of terror groups. He said that he vetoed the sale of longer-range missiles to Syria in order not to upset the military balance in the Middle East.

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — He was the ultimate Israeli high flier, literally as well as metaphorically, shepherding and shaping the Jewish state through war and peace with a singular, sometimes mordant charm.

"Ezer was a symbol and the embodiment of the Israeli sabra," Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said of the former air force chief, defence minister and president. "I have lost a commander and a friend."

Israel's political and military establishment showed up en masse at an April 26 memorial service to listen as Sharon, President Moshe Katsav, Israel Air Force head Eliezer Shkedi and Weizman's daughter, Michal Yaffe, eulogized him.

"Weizman will be remembered as a great patriot," Katsav said. Directing his words to his dead friend, he added, "A sense of hope and resilience is following you, not one of despair and grief."

As Sharon paid tribute to Weizman's strength, importance and wisdom, he added, "There was also another Ezer, of the colony, the bottle of drink, the laughter, which all created a special spirit in the Air Force."

Weizman was buried later that day. By his choice, his final resting place is not on Jerusalem's Mount Herzl, where many of Israel's national leaders are buried, but in Or Akiva, next to his son Shaul and his daughter-in-law Rachel, who both died in a 1992 road accident.

The scion of Zionist aristocracy – his uncle Chaim Weizmann was Israel's first president – Weizman was born in Tel Aviv in 1924 and served in the Haganah underground. After earning a flying licence as a teenager, he volunteered to fight alongside British pilots in the Royal Air Force during World War II.

Weizman grew up in a multilingual home – Yiddish, Russian, Arabic, English and Hebrew all could be heard there – and spent time studying in London, where his sister lived. Those experiences gave him command both of the Queen's English and European-style diplomacy, both of which proved useful in brokering Israel's landmark Camp David peace accord with Egypt in 1979.

"Just as he fought bravely for Israel's security, so too did he struggle spiritedly for peace," fellow elder statesman Shimon Peres said. "He never ceased charming the country, from its first founding."

Former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, who brokered the Camp David agreement, called Weizman "one of the true heroes of Israel, in both times of war and peace."

But Weizman always remained the scrappy sabra, indifferent to – and sometimes clearly delighting in – the offence his wit could cause among feminists, gays and the religious.

Approached by a young woman who wanted to become one of Israel's first female fighter pilots, Weizman notoriously responded, "Maydele, have you ever seen a man darning socks?"

After the 1967 Six Day War, a victory in which the Israeli Air Force that Weizman had created played such a key role, the deputy chief of staff doffed his uniform and joined Golda Meir's coalition government. But Weizman resigned a year later to protest Jerusalem's acceptance of United Nations Security Council Resolution 242, which called for Israel's withdrawal from Arab lands captured during the conflict.

That he was to become a key player in Camp David, when Israel agreed to return the Sinai to Egypt, heralded a rather contrarian style of politics on Weizman's part. Having helped engineer the election victory of Menachem Begin's Likud party in 1977, he later became a member of the Labor party.

Weizman quit parliamentary politics in 1992, shortly after his son and daughter-in-law were killed in a car crash. A year later, he accepted Labor's nomination to become Israel's president, a post confirmed by the Knesset.

Following the 1993 Oslo peace accords, Weizman harangued then-prime minister Yitzhak Rabin for being too quick to negotiate with the Palestinians, and later criticized prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu for being too slow.

Weizman relished the office of president, which allowed him not only to challenge Israeli leaders, but also to represent the country abroad. Yet Weizman's tenure ended under a cloud in 2000 when, dogged by revelations of financial impropriety while he served in the cabinet, he became the first president to resign.

His health declined soon thereafter, and he spent much of this year hospitalized. Weizman is survived by his widow Reuma and their daughter Michal.

Rockets hit Sderot

Two Palestinian rockets fired from Gaza landed in the southern Israeli town of Sderot last Tuesday, causing no damage. There was no immediate claim of responsibility. Most Gaza terror groups, except for the breakaway Popular Resistance Committees, generally abide by a PA-brokered ceasefire. An early-warning system in Sderot detected the launches in time to warn residents.

Settlers protest in Gaza

Thousands of Jews flocked to Gaza to protest Israel's plan to evacuate settlements. Settler leaders estimated that as many as 100,000 people would take advantage of the Pesach holiday to attend Wednesday's rally in the Gush Katif bloc, but only about half that came. Israel put extra security at Gaza border crossings, but a Palestinian mortar came close to hitting the demonstrators. There were no casualties.

Seder-night traffic snarl

Thousands of Israelis spent hours in Passover traffic due to a terror alert. After an intelligence warning of an impending Palestinian attack on Erev Pesach, checkpoints were set up around central Israel, paralyzing major highways. Motorists experienced delays of up to five hours returning from seders. The alert was lifted after five Palestinians were detained, but they were illegal workers not terrorists.

GRAVE BUSINESS: Some 100 haredi protesters held up work last week on the northern section of the Trans-Israel Highway near Zichron Ya'acov after word some ancient Jewish graves had been disturbed along the construction route. At least 29 protesters were arrested. When the graves were discovered a few weeks ago, they were removed for suitable burial elsewhere. Three graves remain in the area, but the road will be re-routed around them. [Israel photo]

Two Palestinians suspected of involvement in a Feb. 25 Tel Aviv suicide bombing that killed five Israelis "escaped" from a Palestinian Authority jail. Islamic Jihad members Shafiq Abdel Ghani and Ahmed Zaki were arrested by PA police shortly after bombing. They were being held in a jail in Tulkarm, recently turned over to PA security control, awaiting trial. PA officials said Palestinian forces were looking for the two men. Israel has long accused the PA of a revolving door policy in its jails.

Hamas must disarm: Abbas

Mahmoud Abbas said Hamas will have to give up its weapons after it takes part in Palestinian legislative elections in July. "The moment a militia or organization becomes a political party, there is no need for it to be armed. There will be only one authority, one law and one legitimate arsenal," the Palestinian Authority president told reporters last week. Leaders of the Islamic terror group vowed to keep their weapons as long as "Israeli occupation" lasts, but were expected to negotiate with Abbas on his demand.

Bunker busters on the way?

The United States plans to sell Israel bombs that can penetrate bunkers deep underground. The Pentagon notified Congress last week that it intends to meet an Israeli purchase request for 100 guided GBU-28 "bunker-buster" bombs, a sale that analysts say could equip Israel for a potential attack against Iran's nuclear reactors, many of which are fortified and buried. Israel said it has no plans for such a strike against its arch-enemy.

David and Goliath

Adapted from Samuel I Chapter 17

This story takes place in at the time of Saul, the first king of Israel, about 2,500 years ago. Israel was at war with the Philistines.

"David, your brothers have been at the battlefront for a while now, and they're probably running low on supplies. Do you think you could bring them some food tomorrow?"

"Of course, Abba! I just have to get someone to watch the sheep while I'm gone. It shouldn't be a problem."

The sun was just peeking over the horizon as David reached the Israelite encampment. A valley separated the Jewish army from the Philistines. David approached one of the Jewish soldiers. "Good morning. My name is David. I'm trying to deliver something to my brothers..."

The soldier began trembling violently and his mouth fell open in horror. "Gaaahhck..." was all he managed to get out before he turned and ran, the other soldiers fleeing with him. The ground beneath David lurched and heaved. An enormous shadow blanketed the grass, and he looked up just in time to see the true source of the soldiers' dread.

A giant man loomed above him.He must have been about 12 feet tall! His enormous body was covered by thick armour, and a copper helmet covered his massive head. He slowly strode from the Philistine camp into the valley. Not even noticing David, he raised his spear, which must have been as thick as a tree.

"I am Goliath!" he roared. "And I challenge you filthy Israelites to a duel. Choose the best one among you and let him fight me. Kill me, and all the Philistines will be your slaves. Lose, and you will be slaves to us. Well? Well? Is your God too weak to save you?" He turned and went back to the Philistine camp, shaking with mocking laughter, and the ground below him shook as well.

David burned inside. He ran to the cowering Israelite soldiers and demanded, "Who is this man who dares to say things like that about God and His people?"

"He's the Philistines' best warrior. Every morning and night he goes into the valley and broadcasts his challenge. Everyone's scared stiff of the guy. King Saul doesn't know what to do. He's promised wealth and honour and even his daughter's hand in marriage to whoever can defeat Goliath, but no one's interested."

"Ha!" said David. "I'm not afraid of this guy. That speech he made has earned him an enemy he doesn't want to have: God."

King Saul studied David intently. "Are you sure you want to do this? You're just a kid!"

"Your servant is a shepherd for his father," replied David, respectfully addressing the king. "Once a lion came and stole one of the sheep. I'm not sure this was a good idea, but I instinctively jumped at the lion and managed to fight it off. The same thing also happened with a bear. I think God purposely made these things happen to send me the message that I can fight this giant and that I should."

David went to the brook and selected five smooth stones, which he put in his pouch. Then he descended the slope into the valley to shepherd's stick. In the other, a slingshot.

Goliath saw his opponent from afar and lumbered toward him. Then he saw how young his opponent was, and that he was unarmed. "Are you playing games with me?" he bellowed. "You think I'm a dog, coming at me with a stick? I'll feed you to the birds! To the animals!"

Undaunted, David looked up at Goliath. "You come against me with your sword and spear, but I come against you with the help of the God of Israel Whom you have scorned. You will be the one eaten by the birds and animals, and the world will see that God is the one who grants victory!"

Enraged, Goliath charged. David quickly slipped one of the stones into the slingshot, drew it back, and fired. He had to hit his target on the first try. There wouldn't be time to try again.

The stone arched through the air and plunged through one of the bars of the giant's helmet. An anguished shriek rent the air, and Goliath fell.

David went on to succeed Saul as the king of Israel.

Mystery story told through e-mails is a novel idea

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Michael Betcherman

Every day at around noon I check my personal e-mail account. A few days ago, the usual string of e-mails flooded my in-box – a few letters from friends, one from eBay and finally a correspondence from someone named Samantha Dempsey.

After quickly trying to figure out who Dempsey was, I remembered that this wasn't a friend, she wasn't a colleague, and, in fact, she wasn't a real person at all. It turns out I was caught in the middle of a good, old-fashioned mystery.

A few days before I had surfed onto emailmystery.com, a website that could one day revolutionize the way we use e-mail and read books. For $10, avid readers and Internet junkies can buy The Daughters of Freya, a "book" about a journalist, Samantha Dempsey, who is sent to write a story about a secret cult that believes sex is the path to peace.

The Daughters of Freya has all the conventions of a mystery novel – the countless twists and on-the-edge-of-your-seat suspense – but there's one significant difference. The story is told through e-mail, as if the reader was peering into Dempsey's in-box. Over the course of three weeks about 100 e-mails – written as if you were reading an e-mail from your friend – are sent to the reader with irrelevant personal information, such as what Dempsey's kids are up to, or more significant dialogues that further Freya's plot. Not only is this a unique way to read a mystery but it also satisfies the snoop in all of us.

"There's a voyeuristic element to this story," says Michael Betcherman, a Toronto writer and Freya's co-creator. "You are not in control of this reading experience."

Before Freya turned into an eavesdropper's dream, Betcherman and co-author David Diamond planned to take a more conventional approach to writing their novel. The two friends had been in contact through the Internet – Diamond lives in L.A. – and decided to write a book made up of e-mails. It was another friend of Betcherman's who suggested to forgo the bound book and send the letters directly to readers' in-boxes instead.

Not only did Betcherman think this was an original idea, but he saw an opportunity to turn the daily routine of checking e-mail into a form of recreation.

"The way this story is told exploits e-mail," says Betcherman. "No one's really used this for entertainment, plus the availability allows people to experience things more or less in real time. The key element is the medium of delivery. The format mirrors the way people actually use the Internet."

According to his website's reader testimonials (where one reader says, "[I'm] going out of my head waiting for the next e-mail"), people are delighted to find a new way to experience their daily e-mail reading ritual. Many excited readers even write Betcherman to ask if they can get all the letters at once instead of waiting each day for their new batch.

Screenshot from the Daughters of Freya website.

"A lot of readers say they go through withdrawal symptoms," says Betcherman. "There's a lot of tension, you can't turn the page to see what's next."

To create a riveting story in a way, which Betcherman says, "has never been done before," the idea has to be believable. Diamond had just written a piece on cults for Wired, so his research provided the setting for Freya, while a journalist was the natural choice for the protagonist as most writers communicate through the web.

"You have to find a reason why people would be communicating through e-mail. The format dictated certain choices. It wouldn't work if it took place in a confined setting, so we needed a scenario that made sense."

The veteran Street Legal screenwriter also says that creating The Daughters of Freya was like writing for TV.

"It was similar to writing dialogue. It felt like I was writing a screenplay."

Naturally, there are some benefits to writing online that penning television shows or conventional novels don't provide.

David Diamond

"One advantage of writing this way is once you have your site up and running, it's inexpensive to keep it up," says the former Israeli pro-basketball player. "Besides paying Visa fees, we get to keep everything else. If a book is sold, you might get 15 cents for it."

Betcherman says he's spent "into the five figures" making this book, but The Daughter's of Freya has sold about 1,000 copies since its official launch last October. Freya received glowing reviews from the Globe and Mail, The Boston Herald and other publications.

Until then, Betcherman is focusing on marketing his "epistolary" project – which is equivalent to a 200-page book – but that doesn't mean he isn't coming up with new ways to expand his online idea. His most promising project is an e-mail book aimed at getting pre-teen boys to read, but other adaptations to his mystery formula, such as a love story, may soon be in the works.

Rock tunes and Torah create new genre of music

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

While they may seem like cultural worlds apart, rock tunes and the messages of the Torah are harmoniously fusing to create an emerging genre of Jewish music.

Though the lyrics come from psalms and prayers, the sounds are edgy and electric, striking a chord with a growing cadre of listeners.

"Jewish music is never completely separated from society," says musician Daniel Greenwood, an observant 50-something Jew who has released two rock Jewish CD's.

"Standard Jewish music is [becoming] rock oriented."

Lyrics come from psalms and prayers

The impetus for the rock album was to give Jewish ears a fresh, daring sound that strayed from the confines of conventions.

"A lot of teenagers were getting turned off by hearing the same stuff over and over again," says Greenwood.

"So my idea was to give them an alternative."

Teens, critics and fellow artists have given Mayim Ad Nofesh favourable reviews.

The Jerusalem Post described the album as "decidedly original" noting the "ideas laid out by Greenwood are inspiring and will hopefully open new doors for many up and coming Jewish rockers."

Famed Israeli guitarist Yossi Piamenta has also raved about Greenwood's tunes, saying he listens to them when he says tehillim.

Released by Israeli distributor GalPaz, the album hasn't quite reached the number of listeners Greenwood covets, prompting the musician to consider seeking out a different distributor for North America.

"Recently, I've started to do as much as I can to promote it here," he says.

Music gives Jewish ears a daring sound

"There's an Internet radio station that has played it on the air…and it looks like it's moving in the right direction."

"When a person hears Torah, regardless of whether it's a person speaking or singing, it's still Torah," he says.

Greenwood says Jewish youths in particular are gravitating to alternative Jewish music because of its diversity and originality.

"There is a movement in making music more artistic, more expressive and the frum youth are buying into it and accepting it," he says.

"The other day, [a yeshiva] student told me he likes the rhythms of my songs because he's not use to these types of beats."

A fan of rock and the blues since childhood, Greenwood's musical training began at age 12, when he learned to play the guitar.

As a teenager, he played in various bands and later went on to perform professionally with several wedding bands.

Today, in addition to producing his own music, Greenwood has his hands full, juggling the demands of playing bass in the alterative Jewish band, Men With Babies, working for a wholesale lighting company and producing music for other artists.

To hear Greenwood's music, visit www.jewishrock.zed.cbc.ca as well as www.da300.zed.cbc.ca.

Mayim Ad Nofesh should be available at the Negev Book & Gift Store and Israel's soon, Greenwood says.

In the midst of a six-city American tour, Israeli singer Shuly Nathan makes a single Canadian stop on May 17, to perform her Jerusalem of Gold concert at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue in Toronto in commemoration of Israel's Independence Day.

Although she performs often in Europe and the United States, Nathan has not performed in Toronto in about 20 years. The solo singer-guitarist plays a rich medley of English, Hebrew, Yiddish and Ladino songs reflecting various styles and eras.

Shuly Nathan

Nathan is best known for introducing the now-classic folk song Jerusalem of Gold to Israelis in May 1967. The folksinger , then 19, had been handpicked to sing the new composition by its composer, Naomi Shemer, the Israeli songwriter who died last year.

Two weeks after Nathan introduced the song, the Six Day War broke out and the city was united under Jewish control for the first time in more than 2,000 years. Vastly popular, the song became enshrined as a permanent part of the universal Jewish repertoire and as a sort of second national anthem in Israel.

Afterward Shemer and Nathan were famous, each in her own right, and remained close friends. Nathan's repertoire includes songs by Shemer, Shlomo Carlebach and other composers as well as Jewish spirituals and Biblical verses put to music.

The opening act for the evening is the Mickey Lewin Quartet, which plays a variety of Jewish, swing, jazz and pop music; Lewin is a Toronto-based musician originally from Israel. Beth Tzedec Congregation, 1700 Bathurst St. Tickets $36, available at Israel's Judaica. Thursday May 17, 8 p.m. 416-523-2305.

Joint Film Development Deal: The National Film Board of Canada (NFB) and the New Israeli Foundation for Cinema and Television have embarked on a joint pilot project to develop five feature-length social-issue documentaries.

The NFB announced last week it will set aside $60,000 for the documentaries, which must have the support of both a Canadian and Israeli producer. The federally funded institution has made similar deals with producers in Britain and France.

"International agreements like this are vital to today's National Film Board, where we're forging bonds with socially responsible public film organizations around the world to explore issues that impact the lives of people everywhere," said NFB chair Jacques Bensimon.

Canadian inquiries should be addressed to Tom Perlmutter, 514-283-9501, or d.mascio tra@nfb.ca. Deadline for entries is September 15.

Two Plays by Yehuda Amichai: Live dramatic readings in English of two radio plays by Yehuda Amichai, Israel's pre-eminent modern poet, mark the Canadian debut of One Little Goat, a four-year-old theatre-production company that moved to Toronto recently from New York.

The plays, both of which are set in Jerusalem, are being co-presented by the Miles Nadal JCC and introduced by Toronto author Barry Callaghan. The director is Vancouver-born poet-playwright Adam Seelig, One Little Goat's artistic director.

To Love in Jerusalem portrays two lovers accused of profaning religious sites with their lovemaking, while The Day They Buried Martin Buber traces the estrangement of two lovers as they reflect on their relationship. The theatre company first staged the works at the 92nd Street Y in Manhattan.

Nadal JCC, Al Green Theatre, Bloor and Spadina. $15. Thursday, May 19, 8 p.m. 416-924-6211.

Celestial Nights: This exhibition of photographs by the remarkable Israel-based photographer Neil Folberg opened May 1 in Toronto's Distillery District. Folberg, an American, uses time exposures, clock drives and various astronomically synchronized devices to get the heavens to reveal themselves for his camera. The starry-night images are beguiling.

At Pikto, Distillery District, 55 Mill St., Building 59-103. Until June 15. Opening reception May 4, 6 to 9 p.m. Artist talk, May 30, 7 to 9 p.m. 416-203-3443.

Holocaust Dream: Artist Daniel Ehrenworth uses a combination of photography and digital imaging to create a surreal vision of Auschwitz in Holocaust Dream, a book of photographs launched last week at the Rivoli on Queen St. "This project is far less about a death camp but rather about the light that must exist in order to have cast a shadow as dark and vast as Auschwitz," Ehrenworth said. The book was published in conjunction with an exhibition that continues until May 28 at the MacLaren Art Centre, 37 Mulcaster St., Barrie. Artist talk, May 5, 7 p.m.

Bonjour Monsieur Shlomi

Shot in 2002 and released last year, Bonjour Monsieur Shlomi is a charming coming-of-age comedy by Israeli director Shemi Zarhin, who wrote the script in "five unusual days" in 2001.

Sixteen-year-old Shlomi Bardayan (Osri Cohen) is an unappreciated pillar of strength whose family leans on him so fully that, except for a wise old grandpa, they fail to notice his special qualities. He's a handsome male version of Cinderella – ignored, ill-treated, and awaiting the magical wand of fate.

Shlomi cooks delectable stews, roasts, cakes and pies to comfort the self-absorbed and emotionally dyspeptic souls in his turbulent household. By contrast, his self-absorbed older brother Doron, a soldier and rock guitarist, seems to live for physical pleasures. With two brothers so reminiscent of Jacob and Esau, can a blessing and inheritance be far away?

As the story opens, Shlomi's parents have separated after an instance of paternal infidelity, but when Dad comes begging at the door for forgiveness, Mom won't let him back across the threshold.

Doron brags of his sexual prowess at the dinner table and coaches Shlomi on how to lose his virginity. Meanwhile their sister Ziva returns home with her twin infant sons after discovering that her husband stays up late surfing X-rated websites.

It's up to Shlomi to repair these familial rifts and project a more wholesome ethos into the world. However, he receives little credit or notice for anything until his teacher and principal recognize his astounding math skills. Simultaneously Rona, the beautiful girl next door, notices him just as he falls in love with her.

Despite a stumbling block laid by his brother, Shlomi's love-match takes and he learns to stand up for himself. After his grandfather dies and leave him an inheritance, he decides it's time to leave home and go live with Rona. Unlike Jacob of old, Shlomi doesn't seem to be fleeing a fratricidal brother, and there's no suggestion that a period of servitude to a Laban-like taskmaster awaits.

Besides its biblical affinities, Bonjour Monsieur Shlomi bears resemblance to a romantic fairy tale from which certain ugly realities of daily life have been excluded. Still, this heartwarming adolescent tale is genuinely funny, satisfying, even uplifting. Bloor Cinema, Tuesday, May 10, 5 p.m.

Sister Rose's Passion

It's easy to see why this 40-minute documentary was nominated for an Oscar last year. The story of Sister Rose Thering, an 84-year-old Dominican nun from rural Wisconsin who influenced the Vatican to retire its millennia-old bias against Jews, is powerful and compelling.

Even as a girl, Sister Rose couldn't understand how Catholics could disparage the Jews, the people from whom the Christian saviour emerged. "Jesus lived a Jew, died a Jew. How is it possible for us Catholics not to love his people?" she used to wonder.

In 1957 she devoted her doctoral thesis to an examination of the anti-Jewish doctrine in authorized Catholic teaching materials. "To my sorrow – not surprise, but sorrow – I saw some very ugly terms," she recounted. Some of the texts repeated blood libels, for example, and taught that the Jews were god-killers and "children of the devil."

Although some elders disparaged her for washing the church's dirty laundry in public, her thesis influenced the Second Vatican Council to forever alter the church's relationship to the Jews with the following declaration: "What happened in His passion cannot be charged against all the Jews, without distinction, then alive, nor against the Jews of today."

That 1965 statement meant that Catholics could no longer blame Jews for the death of Christ. "No more, no how, can anybody say it," said the feisty Rose. "And if you ever hear somebody say that, you can tell them, 'You better study your religion, because it doesn't teach that any more.'"

Sister Rose's passion is revealed in scenes where she protests Kurt Waldheim's appointment as president of Austria and disparages actor-filmmaker Mel Gibson for the deceptiveness and historical inaccuracies of his controversial film The Passion of the Christ, which she called "shocking."

A board member of a Christian college, she was appalled by the wave of anti-Semitic incidents that hit the college after Gibson's film opened. She expressed frustration that despite the Church's revised position, old anti-Semitic attitudes die hard.

"On a popular level it persists – the feeling that the Jews were responsible for the killing of Christ and bear a special burden for it," she said. "They changed the textbooks but not what's in the teacher's mind."

Filmmaker Oren Jacoby also included scenes of the late pope John Paul II visiting Auschwitz and the Western Wall in Jerusalem. "This is the first pope who has knelt down and prayed for Abraham's children," Rose observed.

A former participant in a New Jersey commission on Holocaust education, she presently lives in a Jewish retirement home in New Jersey. "Sister Rose thoroughly identifies with Jewish history and Jewish feelings," said one commentator. "She responds to everything almost with a Jewish heart."

Appropriately, the documentary ends with Ruth's famous quote to Naomi from the Book of Ruth: "Your people will be my people; your God will be my God."

Sister Rose's Passion is being screened at the Bloor Cinema, Sunday, May 8, 5 p.m.

World War II changed the lives of American Jewish soldiers

GI Jews: How World War II Changed A Generation* by Deborah Dash Moore, Harvard University Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When the war in Europe ended with Germany's unconditional surrender to the Allies on May 8, 1945, more than 500,000 American Jews were in uniform. Their experiences, whether on the front or behind the lines, had a profound impact on their lives and their relationship with the United States.

Moore, a professor of religion at Vassar College, uses memoirs, oral histories and letters to recount the story of 15 young men from different walks of life and immigrant backgrounds who faced military service after the United States declared war on Japan and Germany in December 1941, following Japan's attack on Pearl Harbor.

Jews rallied to the cause, but unlike most Americans, they generally considered Germany rather than Japan as the arch foe. Japan, not Germany, had bombed the U.S. naval base at Pearl Harbor, and thus Japan was seen as the main adversary.

Although Jews were as patriotic and able-bodied as anyone else in the army, navy, marines or air force, they sometimes found themselves contending with anti-Semitic stereotypes.

As a result of age-old slanders, Jews were suspected of physical weakness, selfishness, cowardice and dishonourable behaviour and thought to be lacking in leadership skills.

And, of course, they were accused of being draft-dodgers. One Jewish professor at City College in New York joked bitterly, "The Battle Hymn of the Jews is 'Onward Christian Soldiers,' and we'll make the uniforms."

But it was no laughing matter. As late as 1918, a U.S. army manual stated: "The foreign born, and especially Jews, are more apt to malinger than the native born."

Not surprisingly, some Jewish recruits faced anti-Semitic slurs in the barracks. Moore adopts a somewhat charitable view of such unpleasant encounters. "They reflected a form of guys' talk," she claims. "Growing up in multi-ethnic cities, boys mastered ethnic slurs as part of maturation into manhood."

But three pages on, she concedes that prejudice in the ranks could gnaw at a man's "sense of self-esteem" and diminish his masculinity.

She takes a far more serious view of an incident that affected Rabbi Roland Gittelsohn, a Reform chaplain who was due to deliver a sermon at the dedication of the Fifth Marine Division cemetery at Iwo Jima.

Two Protestant chaplains immediately protested, claiming that a rabbi should not preach over graves that were predominantly those of Christians. Protesting these comments, three outraged Protestant chaplains boycotted the ceremony in solidarity with Rabbi Gittelsohn.

Despite such unpleasantries, the majority of Jewish soldiers had no problems fitting in, though Dash adds that small-town Jews had an easier time of it. As she puts it, "They had grown up as a minority and were used to living among Christians."

Still, the armed forces could be daunting, particularly to Jews unaccustomed to non-kosher food. "If reveille awoke young American men to the reality of military service," she observes, "army food alerted many Jews to the fact of their difference."

Nevertheless, Jews did their best to integrate, knowing their life might depend on it on the battlefield.

Although a large proportion of soldiers – Jews and non-Jews – never saw combat, they invariably faced dangers. In the Pacific theatre, for example, harsh jungle terrain and tropical diseases threatened everyone. And on occasion, enemy bombs and artillery shells landed far behind the lines.

Almost all Jews opted for an "H" (Hebrew) on their dog tags, though officers were less likely to identify themselves as Jews.

On balance, Moore says, the "H" dog tags united Jews in a collective identity, joining religious and secular Jews in a single category. "Ironically, under army auspices, Jews achieved a group cohesion they never found as civilians," she says.

Yet these dog tags could prove incriminating under German captivity. Soldiers captured at the 1944 Battle of the Bulge who acknowledged their Jewish faith were sent to Berga – a slave labour camp – after being interned in the Stalag 9B prisoner-of-war camp.

Nothing prepared Jewish GIs for Berga. A soldier who served in the 12th Infantry Division later told his daughter: "You never really get the smell of burning flesh out of your nose entirely."

Many GIs, such as radio operator David Cohen of the 4th Armored Division, were sick to their stomachs, and never forgot the horrific sights.

Maurice Paper, a combat engineer who helped liberate Dachau, was so moved that he became a strong Zionist. His rationale was that Jews should have a right to defend themselves in a Jewish homeland.

Few Jewish soldiers after the war were prepared for manifestations of anti-Semitism. Larry Geller, an infantryman visiting Paris, was shocked to see demonstrators carrying placards that read, "Down with the Jews." The protesters were reacting to efforts by returning French Jews to reclaim their property.

The Paris demonstration had a two-fold effect on Geller. It led him to the conclusion that anti-Semitism was here to stay. But having responded to the call of arms by his country, Geller was determined to fight prejudice.

For other Jewish soldiers, the war imbued them with a resolve to combat fascism and Axis values.

According to Moore, mass Jewish participation in the war legitimized Jews and Judaism – one of "the fighting faiths of democracy" in the military – in the eyes of many Americans.

"The war would make Jews visible, not as objects of scorn and hatred, but as subjects participating in American culture, politics and survival."

Back home, demobilized Jewish soldiers turned to the unfinished business of rectifying injustices through fair employment practices and civil rights legislation. This process also occurred in Canada.

During the postwar era, Jews who had risked their lives as soldiers challenged restrictive housing covenants, discriminatory classified ads and university quotas.

As historian Leonard Dinnerstein has noted, "Many Americans resolved to do something about bigotry in America."

GI Jews should be read in conjunction with Flint Whitlock's Given Up For Dead: American GI's in the Nazi Concentration Camp at Berga and Ted Barris' Days of Victory: Canadians Remember, 1939-1945.

In clear, strong prose, Whitlock, a military historian, tells the little-known tale of American Jewish and non-Jewish soldiers, such as William Shapiro and Anthony Acevedo, who endured incredible hardships in Stalag 9B and Berga. It is well illustrated and contains maps for easy reference.

The revised and updated edition of Days of Victory is a volume of reminiscences in which Canadian soldiers and civilians recall the war. These voices ring clearly, even after 60 years.

History, fiction and humour

An interview with the author of The Secret Mitzvah of Lucio Burke

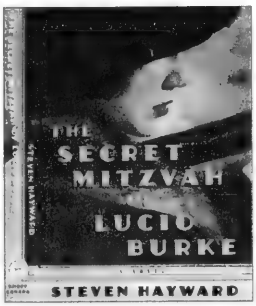
By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Steven Hayward's book The Secret Mitzvah of Lucio Burke (Knopf Canada) was released this spring and has been well received across Canada. The CJN interviewed the author to determine how a nice Canadian Irish Italian boy came to write a book that captures the character and humour of the Jewish immigrant community of Toronto in the 1930s.



The book is a historical novel about two teenage boys named Dubie and Lucio, their love for a beautiful Communist named Ruthie, baseball and the infamous riot at the Christie Pits that pitted members of the Swastika Club against the diverse immigrant community of that period.

Hayward, 35, has a doctorate in English literature from York University and now lives in Cleveland, Ohio, where he teaches at John Carrol University. He was in Toronto recently for a book reading.

CJN: Steven, you're not Jewish and your wife isn't Jewish. How is it that you know so much about the Jewish community?
Hayward: You can't hold the chupah at your best friend's wedding or go to your best friend's child's bris or go to your great old friend's father's funeral and not participate in all of those things.
CJN: Was your family involved with the Jewish community?
Hayward: The point of intersection between the Italian and Jewish community in the 1930s was the needlework industry.

My grandparents lived on Beverley Street in close proximity to a number of Jewish families. They always told stories about their Jewish neighbours, about hanging around and laughing with them.

This is a book about the alliances that develop between different immigrant groups. About the way that ethnic groups intersect, intermingle, influence, change and benefit from each other. That was a part of my family's history.

There is a lot of talk today about Toronto being a multicultural city. I think it's been that way for a long time. In fact, my grandfather used Yiddish and Italian words all the time.

You know, I was pretty old before I realized that meshugene wasn't an Italian word.
CJN: Do you identify with anyone in the book?
Hayward: Like Lucio Burke, I'm Italian Irish. I also lost my father when I was quite young and grew up feeling like a bit of an outsider.

Lucio's experience with his Jewish friends and neighbours is also very much my experience. I share with him a love and admiration of the beauty of the Jewish tradition.
CJN: Where did you grow up?
Hayward: Although people think I grew up around Christie Pits or in downtown Toronto, I actually grew up in Richmond Hill. But my grandparents always talked about where they lived when they came to Toronto and I became convinced that where they grew up was much more glamorous, much more real than where I was growing up.
CJN: You use humour, animal imagery and mythology to describe the dreams of Toronto's immigrant community. Where do all the legends come from?
Hayward: My family always told stories to explain everything. For example, I remember my grandmother explaining that baldness ran in our family ever since my grandfather picked a trout out of the Don River that had real human eyes. Baldness began the day after my family ate the fish.

Now, I'm sure the story is fictional. But these are the stories that are given to you. And what they're really telling you is how many miles had to be crossed to tell you this story. Or who you are. Or the way to look at the world. Or what you believe.

I needed the freedom of the imagery to tell the human story and not just a historical treatise of the time. So while the characters in The Secret Mitzvah are involved in their lives, there is a bird, which, like anti-Semitism in the 1930s, hovers over the city like a malignancy.

Steven Hayward

CJN: The book begins with "It's a true story," yet the narrator later says, "But I don't believe a word of this story myself."

The Secret Mitzvah combines fiction about life in Toronto in the '30s with historical narrative and newspaper accounts of the European rise in Nazism and threats of violence in Canada. (Since this interview, some critics have complained about the fictionalization of events at Christie Pits.)
Writing historical fiction is always a challenge. What did you intend by intermingling history with fiction so closely?
Hayward: If the book has an authenticity in its inauthenticity, it is more than I could have hoped for... The story is about memory. I wanted to write a novel that would be like something you would hear from your grandparents. A story full of exaggerations, half-truths and magical moments. That you know is true and not true at the same time.

Clearly, anti-Semitism in Canada in the 1930s was pervasive. But I wanted to get across the human element of it. So I had to have characters who were engaged with each other and involved in their own lives yet involved in the history of the time.

What unites these characters is the way they are all involved in history. History doesn't collapse on them. It doesn't ambush them. They seek to involve themselves in it. And they do, but never with circumstances that they choose.
CJN: Why is there no focus on the Depression?
Hayward: People sometimes ask me why the book isn't more depressing. It's a fair question. We're told that the Depression was a time of enormous emotional, physical and economic deprivation. And that's true. Yet, while that deprivation produced a lot of extremes, like Nazism and fascism, it also produced people like Ruthie the Commie – gorgeous, fierce, passionate, committed and hopeful.

One of the things that later got destroyed was the hope of someone like Ruthie that the world could be a different and better place.
CJN: So, what is the secret mitzvah of Lucio Burke?
Hayward: The concept of mitzvah is something that resonates within the acoustic of the time and the book. In many ways, history is about cleaning up a mess you didn't make. In that respect, the characters are all involved in a mitzvah.

PLANNING FOR RETIREMENT?

Were you happy with the amount of income tax you paid last year?

There is no limit to the amount of income tax that the government will accept from you.

However, there are ways to pay less tax, legally, of course!

We can show you how to use dividend income or capital gains, which are taxed at a lower rate than interest income, or Return of Capital products, which incur little or no tax, to help you reduce the amount of tax you must pay.

Love drama infused with comedy

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

You wouldn't expect to see comedy in a play about love and anger, but The Anger in Ernest & Ernestine is surprisingly funny.

In the remounted production, co-written and directed by Leah Cherniak, squabbling newlyweds learn that through anger, intimacy blossoms. "When you love someone, anger can often emerge. We are vulnerable, we have expectations, we want everything to be perfect. There is the danger and fear of losing love, and all of this can precipitate anger," Cherniak says.

This play explores the naivete of two people embarking on a relationship as if they've never been in love before. What they unearth is not only dramatic, and tinged with conflict, but also touchingly humorous.

Physical comedy spices several scenes, and the audience feels comfortable watching this ordeal. The actors, Rick Roberts and Jenny Young, break the "fourth wall" by looking at the audience and bridging that gap.

Cherniak's Theatre Columbus, now in its 20th season, is known to infuse a spirit of improvisation and physical comedy into shows.

The themes in The Anger in Ernest & Ernestine are so universal, the play has already spanned the globe since it debuted in 1986. Spain, France, Australia, Cuba and Nanaimo have all staged productions of the two-hander, and it won the Dora Mavor Moore Award for Outstanding Production in 1987. Why has it attracted so much attention?

Cherniak describes Ernest as an organized man with a sense of order. Ernestine is loaded with pizzazz and energy, and while Ernest's rhythm is slow, hers is fast. The couple resembles a newlywed version of The Odd Couple, but they learn about each other under the gauze of angry love.

In order to inject the play with emotional strength, Cherniak tapped her own life for inspiration. "I have a readiness to express or conversely express anger. I'm the kind of person who has anger, and it's interesting to investigate which situations I tend to express it."

And for those cynical about Cherniak's love-anger connection, she makes one simple statement that sums up how those two emotions are linked: "It's an energy of wanting more."

The Anger in Ernest & Ernestine opens May 11 and runs to June 5 at Theatre Passe Muraille, 16 Ryerson Avenue. Tickets range from $23 to $30. For tickets, call 504-7529.

Maccabiah seeking Israeli families to host athletes

By DAPHNA BERMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Organizers of this summer's international Maccabiah have launched a public appeal urging Israelis to host Jewish athletes from around the world in an attempt to forge relationships between the visitors and the Israeli public.

As part of the "Your Friend in Israel" program, organizers have turned specifically to Israel's anglophone community in the hope that English speakers will be able to communicate effectively with their visitors even before their expected July arrival date.

"The idea is not to have a single athlete leave Israel without having made an Israeli friend," Aviel Abromovich, head of the Maccabiah's volunteer wing, explained.

As part of the program, Israeli hosts are expected to meet the athletes at their hotels, invite them for a home-cooked meal and show them the non-tourist side of Israel.

"It's a platform for connection with the Jewish people," Abromovich said. "It's important for a Jewish athlete from Bolivia to meet a Jewish athlete from Norway, but they're meeting here in Israel, in the centre of the Jewish world, and it is important that they meet Israelis too."

In the past, only athletes who requested home hospitality for the weekends – a relatively small number – came in contact with "everyday Israelis."

As part of the new program, every athlete will have at least one Israeli friend to be in touch with via e-mail before the summer.

The Maccabiah, which is scheduled to run from July 11 to 21, is expected to draw some 6,000 Jewish athletes to Israel.

Two for Bridge

By ERIC KOKISH and BEVERLY KRAFT

Beverly: When online bridge made its debut more than a decade ago, the graphics and software were not very user-friendly. Still, the idea was intriguing as it created opportunities to play bridge, perhaps extensively, from the comfort of home, without having to round up three other live bodies to do so.

The ground-breaking work of OKbridge revolutionized the medium and attracted a huge following. For years, it was the only game in town, so to speak. Today there are many sites including e-Bridge, which introduced the concept of online Vugraph coverage for some of the world's major events. The medium has grown and improved dramatically.

Eric: And then, there's Bridge Base Online (BBO), a company originally developed by Toronto's own Fred Gitelman (who wrote this column before us) and Sheri Winestock, to create and sell educational bridge software. With their partner Uday Ivatury and plenty of support from the world bridge community, they have taken BBO from the new kid on the block to the most popular online site in the world. Not only is the site free to its members, its "play" department is bolstered by an extensive "learning bridge" section, and the biggest hook – live (and archived) online Vugraph coverage of virtually every significant bridge competition in the world. The viewer is provided not only with the deals as they are played, but also with expert commentary provided by interested stars who offer their time and services gratis to help promote the game. BBO also offers organized tournaments, an increasingly sophisticated section for bidding practice, and a teaching platform.

Beverly: One of the features that the best online sites provide is a "recording" facility that allows participants to review their sessions in depth, through either a complete text-file record, an online review process known as a "bridge movie" in which deals can be replayed card by card visually, or both. From personal experience, there is no better medium for improving your bridge. Today there are professionals in a complete spectrum of skill and price ranges who offer live supervision and review services for individuals and partnerships, and who will be pleased to play with students online for an hourly fee.

Eric: Today's deal was played in a recent online practice match. Its hero is Mark Molson, for many years one of Canada's leading players in partnership with Montreal's inimitable Boris Baran. Several years ago, Mark became an American resident and he's played most of his bridge in the United States, where he's a highly successful professional.

Although Mark Gordon might have explored the possibility of 5♣, his balanced hand suggested that 3NT would often be better, and an uninformative auction might help in the play. Win Allegaert led the ♠7. Declarer ducked Jaggy Shivdasani's king, and the continuation of the ♠10, West overtaking to lead the eight to clear the suit as dummy parted with a diamond. The early play strongly suggested to Molson that the spades were five-three, and that leading towards the ♥K for his ninth trick could not work: if West held the ♥A, he'd use it to cash two more spades, and if East had it, there would be no heart winner for declarer.

In such cases it's invariably right to cash the long suit, hoping that the defenders would not be able to discard to their advantage. On the run of the clubs, West threw two hearts and then a spade, East two hearts and a diamond, dummy another diamond. This was the end position:

Declarer was confident that he could read the ending and led a heart, putting in dummy's eight when West followed low. East won and switched to the ♦5, but Molson won the trick in dummy and called for the ♥K. When East won the trick and exited in diamonds, declarer took the last two tricks with the ♦A and the established ♥10 for a spectacular +600.

Beverly: It would not have helped West to keep three hearts and throw his spade winner or a diamond, because declarer would have countered by playing three rounds of diamonds to collect dummy's ♥K at the end. Indeed, he could have played that way in the actual position.

West did miss a chance, but it was not an easy one; after overtaking the ♠10 he had to switch to a heart. If the defenders are that good, the game is simply too tough!

Looking for a nice Jewish boy

By SANDIE BENITAH

There are some real problems that go with being young, Jewish and single in this city and, yes, it has everything to do with meeting people of the opposite sex.

In fact, this has led to some drastic measures being taken by some very un-drastic people I know.

It used to be that a group of Jewish youngsters could go out on the town and come back with a few new numbers to add to their list of cute Jewish boys and girls in the area. Now, it seems that wherever we go, we run into the same people we've met the week before and the week before that, the same people we went to camp with, went to school with and, tragically, already went on a date with.

It's quite clear to me that not only are we no longer youngsters but we've also all become nothing more than scenesters – reliable fixtures in a local hot spot whom you can always count on seeing on a night out.

So what's a girl to do to meet a cute, new face these days?

J-date is not an option. I don't care how many success stories I hear, I'm not going to get noticed while I'm sitting at home in my raggedy pajamas typing away. I want to be out there, having fun, feeling good, looking good and meeting people face to face, people who are not afraid to put themselves out there without hiding behind some ludicrous screen name.

Besides in this city, logging on to J-date is more like a cybercast high school reunion, where you spend most of the time pointing out all the people you know and clicking on their profiles to see what they're up to.

My good friend, let's call her Samantha, decided enough was enough. Sick of the same old "Jew-dos" – parties at which you'll see every Jew you've ever met – she decided it was time to take charge of the situation. She joined a baseball team.

"It's a co-ed baseball team, but I think most of the players are guys," she said excitedly, the night before her first big game. Dressed in the cutest uniform she could find, she stepped up to the plate and kept her eye on the ballplayers. Unfortunately, she didn't even have to swing once to know that she had struck out. None of them were Jewish and so, she was back to square one.

This time, she took another one of our friends with her, and together they spent a night sitting at a table, as guy after guy sat down in front of them for a couple of minutes. Unfortunately, she still didn't find a nice Jewish boy she wanted to slow down with and so, she kept on in her quest.

She decided to change out of her running shoes and into a pair of black pumps, paying a steep price for a pair of tickets to a charity ball.

"I always wanted a guy who's sensitive and unselfish," said Sam. "What better place to find such a man?"

She met a few cuties and was encouraged by her progress, so much so that she registered for a doctors' convention – a four-hour seminar on the benefits of technology to medicine.

Although she said she spotted a few George Clooney ER-type look-alikes, she also showed me the bruise on her arm, where she had kept pinching herself to stay awake.

But oddly enough, dating is never painful for Samantha, who always manages to find a way to make the whole process a fun time.

Sure, in Toronto, the city of neighbourhoods, it's hard to find one neighbourhood of Jewish people you don't have ties to, and in many ways, we should be proud to have such a close-knit community. But when you're dating and you're sick of being stuck in the same old scene, it's good to have friends like Samantha to remind you that life and dating is really about making your own opportunities.

4 cups baby spinach (4 oz.)
1/4 cup mint leaves juice of 1/2 lime
2 tsps. balsamic vinegar
1 tsp. chopped shallot
1/2 tsp. salt
1 tblsp. extra-virgin olive oil freshly ground black pepper
1 nectarine, thinly sliced
1/2 cup fresh blueberries or 1/4 cup dried

Place spinach in large mixing bowl. Stack mint leaves and cut them crosswise into thin strips. Toss the mint with the spinach. Sprinkle berries & nectarine on top.

For the dressing, combine lime juice, vinegar, shallot & salt in small bowl. Whisk in oil. Season dressing to taste with pepper. Serves 4.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I am raising a very difficult, manipulative teenage girl. She is bright and pretty and knows how to use both these traits to her advantage. It doesn't help that she is "daddy's little girl." He adores her and he can't say no to her.

When there is disciplining to do, I'm the one who does it. If she is unhappy with my decisions she runs to her dad and turns on the waterworks. He melts when he sees her crying and gives in to whatever she wants.

This is taking its toll on my marriage, and my daughter is learning she can get away with a lot if she goes about it the right way. How can I get through to my husband and show him she is playing him for a fool? He thinks this is my problem because I'm too hard on her.

Teenage Horror

Dear Teenage Horror,

Raising a teenage girl can be very trying, but it is important to keep things in perspective. Remember, throughout her growing years she went through many phases, and as you worried your way though each of them, they eventually ended and she went on to the next phase.

First and foremost, it is important as parents that you and your husband are on the same page where her safety is concerned. Anything beyond that is a matter of opinion. If you know your husband will overturn your decisions, then make it a rule in your home that these decisions must wait until dad is home and you can discuss them together.

It's important to pick and choose your battles. If everything is a fight, your daughter will become desensitized to your rules.

One thing you should feel comfortable about, however, is the special bond between your daughter and husband. Even though it sounds as if she has the ability to turn things upside down in your home, it also sounds as if there is enough love to get you through this tough phase your family is experiencing.

Thank you to the women of the Shoshana chapter of Hadassah-WIZO for helping with this solution.

Just another white man

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

To them, we are "white men" because we are non-native Canadians and thus members of a group who entered their homes and savagely stole their children from their embrace, sending them to residential schools – an action tantamount to a war crime. We are part of a group that acted with counterfeit gentleness while kidnapping the conception of their love, their offspring – an evil act, cloaked in deception, for which there was little subsequent accountability.

To many of our aboriginal people who have learned about the white man setting their villages ablaze, humiliating their elders and torturing their medicine men, we are also responsible, as responsible as any other Canadian, for the direct or indirect participation in the killing of up to 90 million, according to some estimates, of native peoples in the Americas, and for introducing deadening and desensitizing whisky to the demoralized native.

Once Canada was a shared land, a borrowed home lent to the Métis and First Nations by the Creator. Now they are strangers on their own soil.

They are strangers because the white man polluted waters where they once bathed, and he over-fished lakes where salmon and trout were once bountiful for all to trawl. The white man created unreachable and grimy refugee camps – reserves – making it illegal for native people to leave (until 1961), and allowed evangelists to prop up the cross in places where the honoured eagle feather once lay.

We white people, we Canadians, we Jews have been careless. We have acted negligently, not unlike the Australians have with their Aboriginals – dismantling lives, rich cultures and belief systems thousands of years old, which are no less significant than ours. And through our tenacity in manipulating and mastering our New World – a place not at all new for native peoples – we decimated families whose progenies are plagued by devastating family abuse, alcoholism and a suicide rate among reserve youth seven times higher than in the rest of Canada.

The resolution of native land claims and, in some cases, resulting financial restitution, simply give back what was taken from the original owner. The Canadian government's decision, following often-abrasive negotiations, to create Canada's newest territory – Nunavut – was not unlike the German government's decision to pay our survivors. It was simply paying long overdue rent and begrudgingly gluing together broken treaties.

At no time throughout the history of this glorious and free country have we prostrated ourselves in front of our First Nations Canadians, begging for forgiveness, as we would expect those who perpetrated atrocities against us to do. Instead we constructed a protective mythology around ourselves that included smut campaign of the "drunken Indian" and [illegible] judgment against the many children on the reserve whose remedy for fierce boredom and self-loathing is sniffing glue and gas fumes.

If our native Canadians, the first Canadians, have a chance of avoiding extinction, Canadians everywhere must all courageously and humbly launch an arduous process of introspection, determining means of recompense, full recognition and honouring of their place in our society, and ways of extending true love, respect and kindness – core Canadian values as well as core values of Judaism.

A heightened consciousness is painful and terrifying to pursue, as it requires acceptance of some of the ugliness that lies within the molecules of humanity and the soul that drives it. Until then, until we decide to achieve greater awareness of our horrific and dehumanizing treatment of our country's once strong and free people, followed by hard-hitting and authentic deeds of retribution, a Jew, together with all other Canadians, will be just another white man to our weary and battered native brothers and sisters.

Peering into the inexplicable past

Canadians look at the ruins of barracks in the former Nazi death camp of Birkenau (Auschwitz II) during the March of the Living in Oswiecim, Poland, last Thursday. About 18,000 people from more than 50 nations took part in the commemoration this year. Israeli Prime Minster Ariel Sharon and Hungarian Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany joined in the three-kilometre March of the Living between the two World War II death camps Auschwitz and Birkenau. Please see related story on page 30. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Israel looks to Canada for help in drafting a constitution

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Nine members of Israel's Knesset left Canada last week with a better understanding of this country's Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which stands to serve as a model for a future constitution in the Jewish state.

For more than a decade, Israel has looked to Canada in the development of a draft constitution because of both nations' multiethnic and multicultural makeup. The Charter of Rights, enacted in 1982, has been regarded by Israel and many countries as a kind of gold standard for its protection of equality rights based on language, religion, culture and other variables.

Israel's interest has led to a number of exchanges with Canada, mainly in the judicial and academic fields initiated, for the most part, by Irwin Cotler, the world-renowned human rights crusader who is now Canada's justice minister. Law professors and judges from both countries have visited. Canada's chief justice, Beverley McLachlin, has lectured in Israel, and Aharon Barak, her counterpart in Israel, has come to Canada a few times.

But the visit by the nine MKs was "the first time a serious endeavour has been made by politicians, not scholars or judges, to work on a draft of an Israeli constitution," said Ronen Gil-

The News in Brief

CANADA

Israeli to Co-operate

TORONTO — The co-founder of three-year-old Toronto-based hedge fund Portus Alternative Asset Management said from Israel that he will co-operate with accounting firm KPMG as it investigates the company for fraud, Bloomberg News reported. Boaz Manor reportedly slipped out of Canada and renewed his Israeli citizenship just days before the start of an Ontario Securities Commission probe into the collapse of the fund and the loss of $750 million. Last month, the OSC seized its assets and sued it for questionable transactions. Portus is accused of spending $88 million – some 12 per cent of the fund's value – on various fees without telling investors.

Chief Meets With Jews

WINNIPEG — Dennis White Bird, grand chief of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs, met Jewish leaders in Winnipeg for a Pesach lunch late last month to mend fences after another native leader made controversial comments about Jews. White Bird met with officials of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg after Chief Terrance Nelson, head of Roseau River First Nation near Winnipeg, wrote to a newspaper saying natives would become more violent against police and hate Jews if David Ahenakew, a Saskatchewan native leader on trial for making anti-Semitic comments, is convicted. "We want to do all we can do together to make sure racism of all sorts is fought against," federation president Neil Duboff told Canadian Press.

NEW TRADITION: Some 35 members of the Okanagan Jewish Community Centre in Kelowna, B.C., took part in the centre's first annual walkathon. The five-kilometre walk, held May 1 at a resort area near Kelowna, raised about $5,000 for programs and activities.

Israel a Threat: Iran

NEW YORK — Israel's nuclear arsenal "has endangered regional and global peace and security," Iranian Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi told a UN conference on the 1970 Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty last week. Iran, which signed the NPT, has faced U.S. censure for pursuing technology that can be used to make nuclear weapons. Israel, which has not confirmed it has such weapons, wasn't at the meeting because it hasn't signed the treaty.

'Gold Train' Claim

NEW YORK — The Claims Conference has released information for Hungarian Jewish Holocaust survivors seeking to join a claim in the "Gold Train" settlement. The U.S. government's $25.5 million (US) settlement will include $21 million for needy Hungarian Jewish survivors. The settlement in the case of a trainload of Hungarian Jewish-owned goods, looted by the Nazis and then confiscated by U.S. troops, will fund social service programs for survivors. Correspondence must be submitted by Aug. 1, and a U.S. judge will approve the final deal by Sept. 26. Details at www.hungariangoldtrain.org.

Neo-Nazi Jailed

MUNICH — A neo-Nazi has been sentenced to seven years in jail for a foiled plot to bomb a Jewish centre in Munich. A court sentenced Martin Weise, leader of the far-right group Southern Comrades, for plans to bomb the centre during a foundation-laying ceremony on Nov. 9, 2003, the 65th anniversary of Kristallnacht. At a separate trial last month, five other group members received suspended prison sentences.

Dachau Remembered

MUNICH — European politicians and Shoah survivors from around the world marked the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Dachau. Some 2,500 people attended the May 1 ceremony at the camp's site just outside Munich. Dachau was the first concentration camp, built soon after Hitler came to power in 1933. It housed political, criminal and disabled prisoners, as well as Jews.

Visit Protested

NOUACKCHOTT, Mauritania — Violent protests greeted Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom when he arrived in Mauritania last week for a one-day visit. At Nouackchott University, rock-throwing students marked Shalom's arrival in the capital of the west African nation, one of only three Arab League countries to have full diplomatic relations with Israel.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

An apparently large number of would-be Birthright Israel participants were puzzled and disappointed to learn shortly before Passover that they would not be going on the free 10-day Israel trip that they thought they'd been accepted for.

Kelly Levy, 22, received a notice Apr. 21 from trip provider Oranim Educational Initiatives, stating that the Israel-based educational tour company had been "unable to ticket" her for her requested departure date.

The recent Humber College graduate, now working as a commercial photographer, had received an e-mail March 8 – more than six weeks earlier – congratulating her on her acceptance to the program.

The letter, addressed "Dear Friends," stated that acceptance was contingent on sending in a refundable deposit and several enrolment forms.

Receipt of Levy's deposit was confirmed on Mar. 25, and she said she was left with the impression at the end of her phone interview that she had been accepted, although Oranim could not guarantee the exact date of the trip.

An April 22 e-mail by Kelly's father, Ralph, to the company requesting an explanation, had not been answered as of last week. He told The CJN that his 18-year-old son had a similar experience to Kelly's, as did about half a dozen of his friends and a couple of Kelly's friends.

Tour operator told them they were accepted

"They should have advised them earlier," Ralph said. "Intuitively, it didn't make sense [to let them know] three weeks before the trip, when they've already interviewed them. The kids centred their whole summer around this. My son didn't get a job until later in the summer."

He said it was "very disappointing" to know that their friends who applied to the program through Canada Israel Experience (CIE) – Birthright's other major trip provider to Canadians – had all been accepted, he said, speculating on whether "something disastrous" had happened.

Rumours of last-minute budget cuts are not true, said Ted Sokolsky, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. But he said the federation, which is a funder of Birthright Israel, is "concerned that the company in question was not judicious and measured in its recruitment methods and subsequent communications.

"We've expressed these concerns with Birthright's office in Israel in hopes that the situation will be greatly improved in the next rounds," Sokolsky said.

To participate in Birthright, which is open to young adults from the ages of 18 to 26, applicants must go to the Birthright Israel website and choose a trip provider.

Canadians may choose between CIE (the largest), Oranim and Kesher Israel Connection, the college department of the Union for Reform Judaism, which accepted two Canadians this summer of 160 North Americans.

Each trip organizer is given a certain number of spots, based on how many participants they have taken in the past, according to Liz Sokolsky, Toronto-based vice-president of education and operations for Birthright Israel.

She noted that CIE has hundreds of people on its waiting list, although it may have been able to fit in some of the Oranim applicants if they fit an empty spot on an individual bus for a particular demographic.

For this summer's Birthright trips, there were 4,000 Canadian applicants for about 1,150 spots. Of those, CIE was allotted 900 spots, and Oranim about 250. In North America overall, more than 16,000 people applied for approximately 8,000 spots.

Gidi Mark, national director of marketing for Taglit Birthright Israel, told The CJN in a phone interview from

'Remember who you are'

From the editor's desk

The exigencies of our weekly production schedule are such that we are always working in future tense. Thus, even though this is nominally our Yom Ha'atzmaut issue, this issue of The CJN will have gone to press fully two days before the holiday. This column was written nearly one week before, on the day following Yom Hashoah. Our news and photo coverage of Yom Ha'atzmaut will appear next week.

The exigencies of our weekly size are such that we seldom have the space in our pages to accommodate all the important stories of the previous week.

Last week, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon took part in the March of the Living in Birkenau. His speech was significant because of the occasion, the content and especially, the audience.

He knew he was speaking to an audience far wider than the thousands who stood before him and the governmental and non-governmental dignitaries who were at his side. He was speaking to nations around the world, imparting his and Israel's credo to them.

So as not to miss publishing his address, following is his speech in its entirety:

"We are gathered here today, 20,000 people, members of different religions and nations, leaders and citizens, at the March of the Living, an impressive and inspiring demonstration of solidarity and remembrance.

"I arrived here today from Jerusalem, the capital of the State of Israel – the only place in the world where Jews have the right and capability to defend themselves by themselves.

"With me, from Israel, are Holocaust survivors: men and women who survived persecution, torture, mental and physical degradation, true heroes who experienced the death marches, the deportations and searches, who survived ghettos, Auschwitz, Buchenwald, Bergen-Belsen, valleys of death, and concentration and death camps whose monstrous names are carved in blood in the history of our people, men and women – who found the strength to immigrate to Israel, fight for its revival, establish their homes there and educate children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren there.

"I asked them to include with them in the delegation their grandchildren who are serving in the Israel Defence Forces. And so Holocaust survivors stand here among us today – again, on this cursed land, surrounded by people in uniform. But this time, these are not German SS soldiers lusting to murder, but the grandchildren of the survivors – soldiers in the Israel Defence Forces – the army of the free and sovereign Jewish state.

"I turn today to these grandchildren – and their friends – Jewish youngsters from Israel and the Diaspora.

"You are standing here with your heads bowed, but standing in pride, many of you probably with eyes filled with tears. Do not stop those tears. Let them flow and remember them. Remember the pain and rage which prompted them. Take this with you, to your homes, and tell it to your friends, neighbours, acquaintances and strangers.

"You had the privilege of being born into a reality in which the Jewish people have a state. It will be incumbent on you to tell of the Holocaust when there is no longer anyone to provide first-hand testimony. You – the link between the generation of the Holocaust and revival and future generations – have the duty to bequeath the lesson, memories and stories, to underscore the importance of the existence of the Jewish state.

"Always remember the victims – and never forget the murderers. Do not forget how millions of Jews were marched to their deaths while the world stood silent; how thousands of Jews floundered in stormy waters searching in vain for sanctuary while the world stood silent; how the borders were closed and how the Jews were herded again behind barbed-wire fences – into detention camps in Cyprus; how so many perished because they could not reach their homeland, and fell victim to the policy of the White Paper, a policy of capitulation to Arab pressure of that time.

"I am certain that all my colleagues – world leaders – remember how the world stood by in silence. Do not let them forget. Remember the silence of the world.

"And remember one more thing – remember who you are: free Jewish youngsters, members of a nation which is spread throughout all continents. And I hope a day will come when we will all be living in the Jewish state, in Israel.

"Indeed, today our people are scattered throughout all continents and in countless countries, but their hearts are in one place: the country which is its own – the State of Israel, the Jewish state.

"The flag of this state – the blue and white flag which you now hold in your hands, fluttering strongly and proudly in the breeze – this is the flag which was so poignantly missing 60 years ago.

"Remember this.

Correction

An astute reader of The CJN, visiting from Israel, called last week to point out an error in the caption to the photo on page one of the issue of April 28. It was not a soldier patrolling along the concrete portion of the security fence, but rather a young man carrying a heavy back pack. Soldiers, the caller told The CJN, patrol that portion of the barrier in jeeps.

Students expelled for anti-Semitic Web posting

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Royal St. George's College, a downtown Toronto prep school, has expelled three students – including a Jewish boy – who posted vicious and threatening anti-Semitic material on an Internet chat board.

Three other students were suspended for not doing enough to prevent the incident.

The private boys' school acted quickly once information about the chat room was brought to its attention by the principal of Branksome Hall, a private girls' school in Rosedale, whose students were subjected to a barrage of anti-Semitic epithets and threats.

"We felt it was our moral and ethical obligation to get involved," Hannaford said. "We pride ourselves in teaching [about] racism and tolerance. We felt it was that important to get involved."

Calling the students' behaviour "inexcusable," he said the postings were "almost as vile as it could get."

In a letter to alumni and to parents of children enrolled at the school, located in the Bathurst and Bloor streets area of Toronto, Hannaford traced the genesis of the incident. Late last month, a grade 10 student started a chat room to discuss topics of interest to high school students. Other St. George's students posted anti-Semitic and racist images on the site. (The material included photos of Jews being tortured during the Holocaust.)

When four Branksome Hall students, who are Jewish, complained about the content, "the response they received from chat board participants was so offensive that they informed their parents and Branksome officials," Hannaford's letter stated.

One Branksome student was referred to as a "kike" and a "hook-nosed parasite" who "should be thrown into the oven with the rest of them."

Hannaford said RSGC parents, including the families of the expelled boys, were shocked and saddened by the incident.

He said that while it did not take place on school property or involve a school website, "as educators we felt morally and ethically bound to act."

Meanwhile, at Branksome Hall, principal Karen Murton addressed students from grades 7 to 12 at a specially convened assembly.

She applauded the four students for not remaining as "bystanders" in the face of racist chat board postings.

"At Branksome Hall we want girls to have a voice," she said. "We encourage you to take a stand and not be afraid to make a difference."

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, participated in the Branksome Hall assembly. He said the students were clearly "devastated" when they heard the content of the message that prompted the expulsions.

"This is not something you can shrug off as a joke," he said. "The four girls should be seen as heroes."

While Congress did not recommend RSGC take any particular course of action, he said "as a parent, I hate to see [expulsion] happen to any kid. As a community professional, this is a hard thing for the students at RSGC to endure, but it also allows them to learn from their errors."

Rudner suggested that expulsion may have "saved them from going down a dark road."

Hannaford said that at RSGC, "we hold people responsible."

"The most encouraging thing to me has been the response of our community, and that includes our students," he said. "Students felt the action of a few had tarnished them. The majority is truly offended that someone could do this."

He said that two of the expelled boys are "exemplary students. When we found out, our jaws dropped."

Hannaford rejected suggestions the incident could be attributed to an attitude that "boys will be boys" or that the language used was typical of the "MSN culture" found on the chat board.

The boys are responsible for their actions and when it came to drawing the line to determine if the offence warranted expulsion, "we didn't see it as close to the line," he said.

Asked to comment on the involvement of a Jewish student in posting anti-Semitic material, Hannaford speculated the boy may not have realized he was responding to a girl, he may not have understood the import of what he was doing and he may have been caught in a case of "one-upmanship" with his peers.

Nevertheless, Hannaford said in his letter to parents and alumni, "we have zero tolerance for this type of activity. We will work with the expelled students as will their parents, to help them understand the gravity of their actions."

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Bridges of understanding can be built between Muslims and Jews through dialogue, say two eminent professors who brought their message to life at a recent interfaith forum.

Speaking before a packed audience at Temple Har Zion last week, Prof. Judea Pearl, father of slain Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, and Akbar Ahmed, an award winning international relations professor based in Washington, engaged in frank discourse about the frayed relations between Muslims and Jews and ways in which it can be improved.

"What emerged from Danny's tragedy was a unique call for us to…lift our common humanity above differences that set us apart," said Pearl, in reference to his son who was murdered by Muslim extremists in Pakistan in 2002.

"It is the greatest victory for Danny that (we are)… carving a path…leading to understanding and collaboration (and) an acknowledgement of familiarity with each other."

The discussion, entitled The Daniel Pearl Dialogue for Muslim Jewish Understanding, was jointly presented by the Association of Progressive Muslims of Canada, the Canadian International Peace Project, Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies and the synagogue.

Former Ontario premier Bob Rae moderated the dialogue and various dignitaries addressed the audience, including the consul generals of Israel and Pakistan.

In their friendly though serious banter, Pearl, professor emeritus at University of California, Los Angeles, and Ahmed, touched on such contentious issues as the proliferation of Islamic extremism, and Jewish settlers in the West Bank and Gaza.

Pearl asked Ahmed to comment on the influence of radical Muslim clerics who use the Koran to support violence against non-Muslims.

He cited the renowned Sheikh Yusuf Al-Qaradawi who issued a fatwa stating suicide bombings against innocent Israelis were permitted.

Ahmed said the Sheikh's views are not the prevailing line of thinking in the Muslim world.

"In no way does he represent the mainstream thinking of Islam…The Koran says that the taking of one life is like the taking of all humanity," said Ahmed, adding that western media devote too much attention to extremist elements, rather than quoting Muslims who preach peaceful messages.

"You are giving [the Sheikh] importance he does not deserve."

"These extremists are a minority," he said.

"Muslims are not terrorists. We are peaceful people who want peace."

While accepting that terrorists are the minority amongst Muslims, Israel's Consul General Ya'acov Brosh spoke passionately against the scope of Islamic terrorism and the pervasiveness of anti-Semitism in Muslim countries.

"It is a fact terrorists are a minority, but the majority of terrorists in the world today are Muslims," said Brosh.

"The best selling book in the Arab world is the [anti-Semitic] Protocols of the Elders of Zion…and the [second] most popular name in the Islamic world in 2002 and 2003 was Osama."

In an unprecedented move, Brosh invited Iqbal for a face to face meeting, in spite of the fact Pakistan and Israel do not have diplomatic relations.

Pearl noted the refusal of Arabs and Muslims to recognize Israel has contributed to the growth and emboldening of hardline Jewish settlers in Gaza and the West Bank.

The computer science and statistics professor also questioned Ahmed about the origins and root causes of Muslim disdain for the West.

Ahmed opined that some Muslims became "defensive" towards the west beginning in the 18th and 19th centuries, when the Ottoman Empire started to decline and European colonialism gained supremacy.

"The Muslim world was going down while Europe was emerging simultaneously," he said.

But Ahmed said Muslim opinions towards the west are nuanced, pointing to a moderate movement in Pakistan that was based on western principles.

"The aim is to balance modernity and tradition," he said.

Ahmed encouraged members of both religious groups to focus more on their common Abrahamic origins and similar values.

"At the core of the Abrahamic faiths we have certain values: justice, compassion, knowledge and respect for family life," Ahmed said.

"In many ways, we overlap."

Rae wrapped up the dialogue on a hopeful note, urging others to follow in Pearl and Ahmed's footsteps.

"We all have an obligation to look each other deep in the eyes and recognize our common humanity," he said.

"As long as we have people like [Pearl and Ahmed] there is cause for hope and there is room for peace."

Students join delegation to AIPAC conference

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Ten Canadian university students will rub shoulders with diplomats, politicians, lobbyists and opinion makers from around the world at AIPAC's annual policy conference in Washington, D.C., later this month.

The students will join 50 delegates from CIJA-PAC, the public affairs committee of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, at the AIPAC meeting. AIPAC is the American Jewish community's advocacy voice on Israel and considered one of the more powerful lobby groups in the United States.

The CIJA-PAC visit to Washington will help Canadians network with others in the field and "motivate people and empower them," said Mark Waldman, chair of CIJA-PAC. "They will get access to some of the top [experts] in the world."

In addition, CIJA-PAC, which is still in its growth stage, will be able to "benchmark" itself against the example of its American neighbour, he said.

Among the dignitaries expected to address the AIPAC gathering are Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, New York Senator Hillary Clinton, Senate majority leader Bill Frist, Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, Israeli Minister of Justice Tzipi Livni, Israeli Minister of the Interior Ofir Pines-Paz, Howard Dean, chair of the Democratic National Committee, and Ken Mehlman, chair of the Republican National Committee.

The three-day conference, which runs from May 22 to 24 at the Washington Convention Center, includes discussion on Iran's quest for nuclear weapons, analysis of the shaping of U.S. policy and "seminars for advanced activists."

Waldman said the 2005 conference will be the third attended by Canadian CIJA members. AIPAC plays an advisory and mentoring role for CIJA-PAC, and it has included a one-day event at the conference aimed at helping Canadian and European communities develop the kind of grassroots organizational strength that AIPAC has shown over the years.

Witnessing the way American lobbyists have created a bipartisan political support for Israel and contrasting that with the Canadian situation can be "depressing," Waldman said.

Canadian Jews have not been as politically active as American Jews, who have put in years building relationships with policymakers and politicians, starting at the grassroots, he said.

Canadians seem more "complacent" but CIJA-PAC is attempting to reverse that and create a cadre of politically-connected activists who will make Israel's case regardless of which political party they favour, Waldman said

In the 17 months since it was created, CIJA-PAC has attracted 3,000 members across the country and the organization maintains offices in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver.

Rachel Chertkoff, program director for CIJA-PAC, said the 10 students who will be accompanying the Canadian contingent will join about 500 American students in a special program geared to addressing Israel advocacy at universities and colleges. The goal is to create a group of students who can "take a pro-active role on campus and work on Israeli advocacy on campus," she said.

While the program will focus on the American experience, the Canadian students will receive supplementary instruction before and after the meeting to help adapt the U.S. experience to the Canadian scene.

"We want this experience to complement the training they get on campuses," she said.

Attending the AIPAC conference, which is expected to attract as many as 5,000 pro-Israel advocates, is "an inspiring experience," she added.

The 10 students – eight men and two women – were selected from 50 applicants. All were already affiliated with either Hillel, National Jewish Campus Life or the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students. They are also CIJA-PAC members, Chertkoff stated.

CIJA describes itself as a non-partisan organization affiliated with United Israel Appeal Federations Canada that directs, co-ordinates and strengthens community advocacy efforts on behalf of the Canadian Jewish community.

Shul's food bank may close doors

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The kosher food bank at the Pride of Israel Synagogue is facing imminent closure if it doesn't receive more donations soon.

"We have enough money for, probably, another two weeks at the most," food bank co-chair Alan Marks told The CJN last week.

Last spring, it closed for more than a month after a slowdown in donations of both food and money, Marks said.

The food bank, which is open one morning per week, is one of two kosher food banks in Toronto. The other is at Beth Sholom Synagogue.

Food donations to Pride of Israel's food bank, which must be kosher and non-perishable, help supplement the basic items that are purchased with donated money. Costs run about $1,300 every two weeks, Marks said.

Have had to cut back amount of food in packages

The main donors include Beth Tikvah Synagogue and Beit Rayim Synagogue, which run twice-yearly food drives, as well as Grodzinski Bakery and Chai Kosher Poultry.

For Passover, volunteers handed out 140 packages in one day, a record number. On an average day, they see about 100 people, who must be on government assistance to qualify for the service.

On a typical day last summer, the food bank, which dates back to the mid-1990s, served 65 recipients, mostly seniors and many of them Russian-speaking because of the demographics of the area.

Following an article that appeared in The CJN last August, the food bank saw an increase in demand for its services, and an initial increase in donations, reported Marks.

Recently, however, volunteers have "had to cut back on the amount we're putting in the bags," said Marks.

Beth Sholom's food bank has also seen increased demand. Just before Passover, the number of recipients rose from between 25 and 40 a week to between 50 and 60, volunteer Kala Solway said.

DROR COHEN: SPORT SAVED MY LIFE

At 24, Dror Cohen, fighter pilot and pilot's academy instructor, was on top of the world. In June 1992, Dror's life changed forever, when the military transit in which he was traveling, overturned and left him a paraplegic. Dazed from painkillers, paralyzed from the waist down and with no sensation in his lower limbs, Dror spent 2 months lying with pins in his body. His spirit and body were completely shattered.

After months of arduous rehabilitation at Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv, Dror decided to embrace his abilities, instead of succumbing to his disabilities.

"I opted for extreme sport in order to overcome the spiritual wounds that came with my injury." With the help of Beit Halochem, Dror has been able to challenge both body and mind by diving, rally car racing, water-skiing, snow skiing, parachuting, free jumping and sailing.

In Athens 2004 at the Paralympic Games, Dror Cohen won the gold medal in the mixed Sonar sailing event. At Beit Halochem, Dror has rebuilt himself both emotionally and physically and is ready for his next challenge. Rehabilitation through sport, at Beit Halochem, saved Dror Cohen.

Zikaron

The commemoration of Yom Hazikaron in Israel is unlike any of the commemorative ceremonies for Remembrance Day that we know in Canada. This is not because human life is valued more in Israel than it is in Canada. The two countries share, indeed both have founded their respective democracies upon, a reverence for and the sanctity of each and every human life.

The difference is rather because Israel is still at war. And the battlefront is never far from the streets and schoolyards of its people. In fact, for most of the past 4½ years, the country's streets, schoolyards, coffee shops and restaurants have been the battlefront. Canadians, thankfully, have been spared such streetside carnage. Not since the FLQ murdered Pierre Laporte in 1970 has a Canadian died in an act of political terror on the streets of Canada.

The Israel Defence Forces is a citizens' army. Each family participates in the defence of the country and has had to do so, alas, through six major wars and many campaigns of terror, since it was born 57 years ago. Not since the end of World War II has there been conscription in Canada.

And because Israel is such a small country, most families, at one time or another in the past 57 years, have grieved for the loss of a loved one, neighbour, friend or acquaintance. Some 20,000 men and women, including the nearly 1,000 victims of Arab terror in the past 4½ years, have lost their lives in defence of the right of the Jewish people to live free in a sovereign Jewish state. Canadian armed forces, known worldwide for their bravery and commitment to duty, thankfully, have suffered relatively few casualties since the Korean War.

Thus, Remembrance Day in Israel is more than a discreet ceremonial act at the 11th moment of the 11th hour of the 11th month of the year, attended by a diminishing number of veterans and a handful of grateful citizens. It is, rather, a solemn day of mourning and recollection, where Israelis travel the country visiting the crowded cemeteries where the fallen are buried. An entire nation remembers. And a stone or a flower, or sometimes even the stain of a fallen tear on the white dust of the grave will mark the visit and accent the memory.

Atzmaut

And then at nightfall, the solemnity transforms to celebration as Israelis mark Yom Ha'atzmaut (Independence Day). The celebration continues through the night and into the following day with an intense happiness born of the humbling knowledge and overwhelming gratitude they carry in their hearts that their celebration, their national existence, their freedom are owed to the ones whose memories they honoured the day before.

Despite their striving these past 57 years, Israelis do not yet live at peace with their neighbours. Indeed, at times, they are hardly at peace with themselves – such is the social tension that constant warfare has wrought upon them. But nor have they lost the hope, nor will they ever lose the hope, that peace is possible, if not actually at hand.

The Catholic Church and the Nazis

You correctly point out that Pope John Paul II made great strides in changing the Catholic Church's attitude toward Judaism and establishing diplomatic relations with Israel ("Hoping Benedict XVI will bring blessing," editorial, CJN, April 28). His one glaring failure vis-à-vis the Jewish people was in shutting down the historical review of the Vatican papers during the papacy of Pius XII from March 1939 to October 1958. The world is entitled to know whether or not the Catholic Church was complicit in co-operating with Hitler's Nazis or Italy's fascists and if, as a result, it aided and abetted the Holocaust. Pope Benedict XVI should reopen the inquiry into the Vatican papers so that the truth be known.

The Catholic Church and the Jews

I felt relieved, reading Jack Chivo's article (John Paul II's legacy: 'One step forwards, two steps backwards,' CJN, April 28).

I thought that I was the only one who disagreed with the wave of accolades for Pope John Paul II coming from Jewish organizations such as the Canadian Jewish Congress, The CJN and even the State of Israel.

The overly joyful reaction of the Jewish community to John Paul's papacy must stem from the old Jewish attitude – we should be grateful when there is no pogrom on Easter or Christmas. Since John Paul did not openly cause an increase in anti-Semitism, he was good for us.

As Chivo has pointed out so eloquently, we got scraps from John Paul's table and felt loved. As enlightened he was, Karol Wojtyla was from Poland, and it was no accident that the worst extermination camps were on that soil. And there was a willingness on the part of the population to get rid of an undesired and despised minority.

In the same issue, you occupy yourself with the new pope ("Hoping Benedict XVI will bring blessing"). Why do we even bother looking at the Vatican? What is of interest there for a Jew? Are we looking for acceptance? Do we feel like a homeless street urchin who must try to see if he will be accepted in the kitchen and can get warm milk? Let's stop worrying about getting the acceptance of others. We have survived as a people because of what we are and represent, and despite others wanting to annihilate us.

What can be derived from Paul Michaels' column ("Remembering details that are often overlooked," CJN, April 28) is that the "road map" peace plan is really useless. The Palestinian Authority (PA) does not want to disarm militants and Israel does not want to stop building or enlarging settlements.

There should be another order for peacemaking. The PA and the Israeli government should sit down and hammer out a peace agreement. There should be referendums on both sides with sufficient majorities required to have the moral and physical authority to implement the agreement.There should be no implementation if there is violence. Peace for Israelis and a state for Palestinians are the only way to overcome rejectionists. A single state is not a solution for Israelis because they want a country with a sizable Jewish majority.

The security fence

Why does The CJN have to provide support to anti-Israel elements by showing a photograph of the four per cent of the security fence constructed of concrete passing through built-up areas (page 1, April 28)? Why not parts of the other 96 per cent of transparent wire fencing going through open countryside?

And since I am kvetching, I wonder how many readers of the paper need to be told what matzah is (in the caption under the "Monkey Business" photograph, April 28).

McGuinty's Passover greetings

To Dalton McGuinty, premier of Ontario:

I find it offensive that you offer Passover greetings in The CJN at the same time that your government has taken the initiative to restore open discrimination against Jews and other non-Catholic religious minorities in education funding.

In case you were not aware, the Jewish community is steadily declining, and the one hope we have of continued existence is to educate our children so that they will be able to continue our traditions, the learning and practice of which cannot be done in secular public schools. I am only asking for my children to get what other Ontario taxpayers get free for their children in government-supported Catholic schools.

I would encourage you to reconsider your position on this issue and to take steps to eliminate this odious and harmful discrimination.

Until you do so, I would request that you not expend any more of my tax dollars to offer me and my community friendly greetings from you and the government while you are discriminating against us openly and in violation of Ontario's international law obligations and commitments.

Ten tips for celebrating Yom Ha'atzmaut

By DONNA GORDON BLANKINSHIP

Israel Independence Day, Yom Ha'atzmaut, falls on May 12 this year. If this is a holiday you have never celebrated, consider adding it to your family traditions.

With Israel in the news every day, the Jewish state is unusually prominent in our minds now, but not always for positive reasons. Celebrating Israel Independence Day gives us a chance to remember why Israel is such an important part of our Jewish heritage.

Take some time this year to share with your family the excitement you felt about Israel when you were a kid. It will be a learning experience for all of you.

1. If the community has an Israel festival of any kind, don't miss it. Here's your chance to show your kids another way of being Jewish that does not involve hours of sitting still in synagogue.

At an Israel festival, you can dance in a Jewish way and "eat Jewish" and maybe even sit in a movie theatre watching an Israeli film. Kids today need some help connecting pride in being Jewish with pride in Israel.

If your community doesn't have an Israel festival, think about helping plan one at your synagogue or school. Start small, with a falafel lunch and a film.

2. Rent an Israeli film from your local library or video store. Have your own Israeli film festival at home or with some friends. The Israeli film industry is thriving. Every year, there are many new Israeli films that offer a great deal of interesting insight into how Israelis are feeling right now and what young people in that country are wearing and saying and doing.

Depending on the ages and interests of the viewers, you may want to check out a 1991 film called Cup Final that tells the story of an Israeli soldier captured by the PLO while the World Cup soccer finals are going on. The soldier and his captors reach an understanding through their mutual love of soccer. This may be a little too sweet an ending for a very complicated subject, but it will get you talking.

Then there are always the classics. Exodus is not an Israeli film, but it does tell the story of Israel's beginnings in an exciting way.

3. Eat Israeli food. Falafel and hummus are easy to make. You can even buy mixes in your grocery store's natural food aisle. And most grocers now offer pita bread. Just add water to the mixes and chop up some cucumbers and tomatoes and you'll have an Israeli feast.

Pita bread is also pretty easy (and fun) to make, especially if you have a clay pizza brick.

If you prefer more of a challenge, find some recipes in The Foods of Israel Today by Joan Nathan.

4. Play some Israeli music. Even your teens will like some of the exciting and fun pop music coming out of Israel today. Check out Ofra Haza, one of my favourites, who unfortunately died a few years ago.

And there's probably a section on Middle Eastern music in the music store your teenager frequents. Don't expect Hava Nagila, unless of course it's done with a world beat sound or as a rap song.

5. Send a letter or e-mail to a friend in Israel. If you don't have a personal friend there, search for a school website and select some pen pals for your children. Children in Israel are interested in polishing their English, so don't let your lack of modern Hebrew scare you away. E-mail is almost always in English.

This would be a great way for your children to learn more about what it's like to live in Israel today. A pen pal will beat a dry text book or homework-giving teacher nearly every time.

If you are unable to make this happen on your own, ask your rabbi or your child's religious school teacher for suggestions. Some Jewish federations have programs to facilitate these relationships through their sister cities.

6. Get together as a family and study the history of Israel. There are a lot of good books on this topic, but be wary of website information unless you are confident of the site's quality. Look at the website of the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education http://www.caje.org/ for the newest thoughts on how to teach about Israel.

7. Review the history of the Middle East peace process – the high points and the low points. The Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), part of CIJA's umbrella organization in Canada, and the America Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) in the United States are excellent sources for timelines on all issues regarding Israel. They may not have materials intended specifically for children, but they explain the situation to busy adults all the time, and therefore need to make their materials easy to understand.

Check out the Near East Report on www.aipac.com. The CAJE Web site recommends reading the editorials on Israeli newspaper websites to gain more insight on the current situation.

8. After you've done some learning about the situation, have an open and honest debate about the issues. Help each other, especially the young people in your family, understand what is happening in Israel today. Talk about media bias and anti-Semitism, but don't get bogged down with simple excuses for what's happening. This is a very complex situation involving many important issues from water rights to refugees. For help in understanding the news media's treatment of Israel, you may consider visiting one of the following Web sites: www.honestreporting.com, or www.camera.org.

If you are a regular reader of a Jewish newspaper, you know this issue can't be tackled in a five-minute argument. Make sure that point is made in your discussion. Your goal should be to increase your understanding and develop interest in following the issues more carefully so that you will all be prepared to discuss this issue with others in an intelligent way.

9. Don't forget Yom Hazikaron, Israel Remembrance Day on May 11. This is the traditional day to remember Israeli soldiers killed in action, but it would also be a good time to talk about the civilians who have been killed in terrorist attacks over the past three years. Several websites offer photos of the Israelis who have died and stories about their lives.

10. Plant a tree in Israel. Jewish National Fund is still planting trees in Israel and you don't have to go there to plant a tree. They even have a special deal. You can pay to plant two trees and JNF will plant the third for free. Trees cost $18 each, $36 for three trees, or $72 for five. They can be ordered online from JNF Canada at http://www.jnf-canada.org/.

Passover, then Yom Ha'atzmaut

Pesach is over. Really over. Hooray! I love the holiday. It truly is my favorite. But it's also the most hectic and intense. (Intense is 17 people living together in my house, and they all expect three meals a day.) Preparation and duration all invoke significance and overload.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

It is too much, an abundance of form and content. Yet, while each detail and ritual require so much attention, each element brings forth wondrous understanding and meaning.

Every year, when the family leaves and the matzah crumbs remain, as the house reverts to its empty state, I ponder these options: highly concentrated doses of family and ritual alternating with empty spaces, personal and professional accomplishments, and sad grandparents. At this time, looking back and ahead, I try to gather my thoughts and savour the experiences of this liberation holiday that is so much work. I want to locate the power that emanates from this ritual celebration in order to invigorate next year's sequence.

Inasmuch as this holiday wipes me out, how can I contemplate more? I look forward to more because I want to drink from the waters of Miriam's well in order to nurture my commitment and reinforce my strength. But I wonder whether I will be up to it one more time. "From whence will come my strength?"

As crazy as it sounds, it may come from the very next sequence of celebrations. Exhaustion can be cause for total cessation, or justification for renewed activity. The Haggadah leads us to consider our next commitments within the context of recalling past events. We count the Omer to link Passover's physical liberation to the spiritual redemption of the Torah on Shavuot. We also sing "Next year in Jerusalem."

So there we are – provided with a sense of both spiritual and physical renewal at the very moment of fullness and vacancy. We look toward Sinai after we experience Egypt's hardships. We sing of Jerusalem after we acknowledge slavery.

With the forthcoming celebration of Israel's independence, we, too, should look back and forward. Back to the time of Egyptian slavery to remember our roots and oppression, forward to next year in Jerusalem, to Zion, the centre of our national religion. We look back to the darkest period of Jewish suffering and forward to our contemporary experiences of liberation, both physical and spiritual. For Israel has meant all that to us as a people, a diasporic nation spread all over the world. Israel remains our centre, a place of identity, safety and learning.

While no seder marks Yom Ha'atzmaut, it shares with Passover this sense of redemption, of liberation, of God's great hand, of human leadership and responsibility. It gives us another distinctive opportunity to focus, celebrate and overload.

Free Bountiful's men and women

I think I will become the leader of a new faith, based on the conviction that in order to be saved, I marry at least three husbands. I will build my compound in eastern Ontario. Children will attend school up to Grade 6 (for boys) and maybe a little more for the girls, who, masters of the faith, need only to acquire at least three husbands to qualify for eternal bliss.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

I will expel excess girls to the small town nearby, and since they will have minimal life skills, and lack the regulation three or more husbands, they will begin turning tricks to survive.

No non-believing outsiders will be allowed in. To leave is to damn one's eternal soul.

When I need a new young stud – er, husband – I will order one from across the border where other groups with similar philosophies live. My only regret is that, unlike British Columbia, Ontario will not pay for the children's schooling (in British Columbia the Independent Schools Act entitles private schools to public funding). Or one day I could just move to B.C., where polygamy and strict adherence to the teachings of the leaders, flourishes.

Whoa, you say. What's all this?

Bountiful, near Creston B.C., harbours a cult. One faction is led by Winston Blackmore, a second by Warren Jeffs, both self-styled prophets of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. (This sect is in no way connected to the mainstream Mormon church, which banned polygamy in 1890.) The men marry as many wives as possible, and produce dozens of children with all those wives. They reportedly marry girls well under legal age and bring in wives from the U.S. branch of the same church. They receive money for their paltry schooling from our provincial government.

The women of Bountiful are prisoners, bound to a cult masquerading as a legal religious option in a multicultural society. The polygamists claim they are a distinct society in which polygamy is the only route to salvation.

Hooey. This is a cult that is breaking Canada's laws against polygamy and maybe underage sex. Period.

Strange, is it not, that guys get all the goodies and women get to share their husbands with multiple so-called sister-wives – way more than the required three – and children grow up without a father?

Horrifying that boys – like male animals exiled from the pride because they threaten the alpha male – are dumped on city streets and left to fend for themselves. They usually end up living on the streets.

Some women have broken away from the group, and we have their courageous public testimonies about what is going on in Bountiful. A few men, born there and exiled to keep the challenges to the powerful leaders in check, also have spoken out.

Now what has this all got to do with freedom and independence, the underlying themes of Passover and Yom Ha'atzmaut? Well, for modern-day bondage, just go to Bountiful.

We may not be able, as Canadians and Jews, to immediately and directly affect the outcome of wars and famine on the African continent or in Asia. But we can start at home. And at home, the men of Bountiful are cocking a snoot at our laws.

B.C.'s (soon to be retired) attorney general has refused to even investigate the allegations of child trafficking and the admitted practice of polygamy.

Our federal justice minister, Irwin Cotler, on April 14 on CBC radio, was very explicit in speaking about trafficking: Canada's policy is, and I quote, "Protection, prosecution, prevention."

So I call on him, and on our community, to ask for protection for the "lost boys" ousted from this cult. For prosecution of polygamists. And for prevention of this odious cult from continuing to share our country while flouting its laws. I call on the federal government to enforce the law, to go to Bountiful, to investigate, and to proceed to remove these people from our midst.

Maybe the cult can move to Ontario. At least they won't get money for their schools. And instead of hiding in a small rural corner of our country, they could live in the Golden Horseshoe, under the glare of full disclosure of their activities.

Until everyone is free, no one is free.

Disability and the Jewish community

The federal government and each province and territory maintain human rights commissions – bodies mandated to investigate and resolve allegations of discrimination based on various prohibited grounds. The prohibited grounds vary from province to province but most make it illegal to discriminate on the basis of race, religion, gender, age and disability. With the Vriend case, the Supreme Court of Canada included sexual orientation in that list as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

When that occurred, in 1998, many felt the various human rights commissions would then be faced with a barrage of discrimination complaints from members of the gay and lesbian community.

This, however, did not happen.

Rather, the most prevalent complaint made to virtually all of Canada's human rights commissions relates to allegations of discrimination based on disability. Despite the conventional thought that society is now more sensitive and responsive to issues of disability, clearly the message is that there is much to be done to ensure equal opportunity and equal access to those experiencing some form of disability.

As members of the Jewish community, we have a responsibility to respond to issues of disability. As part of a series of commandments instructing us to look after our neighbours – to look after one another – we are told in Leviticus 19:14: "You shall not insult the deaf or place a stumbling block before the blind."

How does Canada's organized Jewish community measure with respect to providing accommodations for people with various disabilities?

Several years ago, the then law and social action committee of the Canadian Jewish Congress attempted to address the issue. The committee even convened a national conference in Ottawa to consider our community's responsiveness to what Congress regarded as a serious concern.

Unfortunately, however, priorities change and, at this time, issues relating to disability occupy a back burner in the current CJC agenda.

Now, many years later, it is obvious that our synagogues and other Jewish community facilities have much to do yet in providing accommodations for people with disabilities.

In terms of physical facilities, newer synagogues have been designed with a main-floor sanctuaries and ramps. But others were not designed to encourage access and full participation for people who have problems with mobility. Some older synagogues have now installed elevators to make the sanctuary accessible to all congregants. But the design of the sanctuary itself, with the raised bimah, does not necessarily allow for full participation.

Years ago, in my own congregation, a temporary ramp was built to make it possible for my mother, who needed the assistance of a wheelchair, to take part in my daughter's bat mitzvah service. It has been years since the ramp was removed and, unfortunately, there are some congregants who find the bimah's two steps to be a challenge to accepting an aliyah. Our current plans to install a railing will merely provide a partial remedy for the problem.

Other disabilities provide yet different challenges. There are large-print prayer books available, yet how many congregations provide them for congregants who are visually impaired? Are our national and local Jewish publications and synagogue bulletins available in audio format for the visually impaired?

Organized Judaism has responded in many positive ways in order to accommodate the disabled in our community. In Toronto, the Reena Foundation has worked for many years to assist persons with developmental disabilities. Some synagogues have designed entrance ways and washrooms that are wheelchair accessible, although few have washroom signs in braille. A few years ago, Congregation Temple B'nai Tikvah in Calgary provided sign language assistance for hearing-impaired families. Some Toronto synagogues provide sophisticated hearing devices for those who need them. And an organization called the Jewish Heritage for the Blind in Brooklyn, N.Y., provides large-print prayer books for the visually impaired.

While there are some synagogues and some community facilities that have made great strides in accommodating persons with disabilities, there must be a greater awareness of the need to be even more responsive. It has been said that most of us live as "temporarily abled" – that at some point in our lives, we will all be faced with the challenge of living with one disability or another.

We must continue to examine our institutions, facilities and priorities to ensure that accommodations are made that will guarantee full participation by the disabled in our community.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Bergen-Belsen

The pastoral, politically conservative region north of Hannover – the sedate capital of Lower Saxony – is captivating and deceptively lulling. On a fine spring morning in mid-April, when the sun is shining and the air is crystal clear, a Canadian visitor sitting in a bus watches pine forests and green fields bearing new crops whiz by. Neat, tidy villages such as Oldau, Winsen and Walle, with their modest, well-tended residential buildings, manicured lawns, perfectly-clipped bushes, daffodil beds and clean streets enhance the overall effect.

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

Before World War II, this table-flat area in northern Germany was quite isolated, far from the bustle and bright lights of Berlin. Even today, it is relatively remote from the fast-flowing currents of a modern, highly developed country that once again is taking its place in international politics. In 1935, two years after Adolf Hitler was appointed chancellor by the president, Paul Hindenburg, a doddering war hero with faulty judgment, the German government built a military base here, far from prying eyes.

By 1940, the base had been converted into Stalag 311, a prisoner-of-war camp for French and Belgian soldiers. Within about a year, following Nazi Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union, the camp was bursting at the seams with 20,000 freshly captured Russian PoWs. In April 1943, the concentration camp, known as Bergen-Belsen, was given an additional role as a holding pen for Jews with foreign passports who, the Nazis hoped, would be exchanged for Germans interned abroad.

In 1944 and 1945, sick prisoners and female inmates from other concentration camps were transferred to Bergen-Belsen. Unbearable overcrowding, exacerbated by a dearth of rations and the wildfire spread of infectious diseases, caused the deaths of some 70,000 prisoners from 40 countries, including 30,000 Jews. "Where Auschwitz had been the epitome of bureaucratically organized mass murder, Bergen-Belsen was the epitome of mass death resulting from the toleration of total chaos," Paul Spiegel, the current president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, recently observed in a commentary.

When Bergen-Belsen was finally liberated by British and Canadian troops on April 15, 1945, the sight that greeted them was nothing short of horrific. What they saw were piles of unburied corpses giving off foul odours and dazed inmates who had been reduced to virtual skeletons by starvation and deprivation. These ghastly, unforgettable scenes of human misery, which earned Bergen-Belsen notoriety as probably Germany's worst concentration camp, were photographed by British and Canadian cameramen.

Last month, several hundred survivors from more than 10 countries, including Canada, Israel and Poland, returned to Bergen-Belsen on the 60th anniversary of its liberation. Among them were Manny Langer, a Polish Jew from Lodz who was interned in Bergen-Belsen in January 1945 and immigrated to Canada in 1955 by way of the United States, and Regina Eisenstein, an Auschwitz survivor from Poland whose daughter, Sharon Weisenfeld, was born in Bergen-Belsen in 1946 and went on to become a principal in the North York Board of Education.

Their trip was jointly sponsored by the World Federation of Bergen-Belsen Associations and the regional government of Lower Saxony, Germany's second largest state. The survivors, with a few children and grandchildren in tow, were transported to Bergen-Belsen by bus from Hannover, a distance of some 50 kilometres.

Manny Langer and Mania Hudy

As Langer and Eisenstein walked past the grey wall that leads straight into the former concentration camp, they were greeted by clusters of solemn teenagers of various nationalities from the International Youth Work Camp, which helps maintain Bergen-Belsen and participates in archeological digs designed to shed greater light on its history and workings.

The youths, some wearing Muslim head scarves, handed visitors coloured paper cut in the shape of doves. On them, in red ink in German, were inscribed messages extolling peace. Mine read: "We wish you and all mankind around the world eternal freedom."

I asked two of the volunteers, both 17-year-old Germans, what they felt on this special day. Karina Schultz expressed shame over Germany's role in the Holocaust. Moritz Kunze was at a loss to understand how an otherwise civilized nation like Germany could have conceived this unprecedented catastrophe.

Bergen-Belsen, which has been a memorial and documentation centre for many years now, has big expansion plans. A new visitors' centre, which is scheduled to be finished in April 2007, will make it all the more relevant.

The Canadian Holocaust survivors who were here in April were quick to notice that the barracks and huts where they clung to life six decades ago are gone, having been burned to the ground by the British in 1945 to ward off rampant disease. What remains in forest clearings are the crumbling ruins of barracks and the main kitchen. The reservoir, where bloated bodies once floated, is bone dry, the water having been drained years ago.

The mounds denoting mass graves are clearly visible. They contain the corpses of an estimated 14,000 Jewish prisoners who tragically died after being freed.

"It's the largest Jewish cemetery in western Europe," said Menachem Rosensaft – a 57-year-old New York lawyer – laconically. His late father, Yossel, a Polish Jewish survivor, administered Bergen-Belsen's Jewish displaced persons camp until its dissolution in 1950. The DP camp, the biggest of its kind in post-war Germany, was housed in barracks that the German army, the Wehrmacht, had used since the mid-1930s. A British army unit, attached to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), uses the space today.

The open fields of Bergen-Belsen, covered by a blanket of grass and heather and hemmed in by dense woods, are dotted with an assortment of monuments – ranging from a Jewish survivors memorial that was unveiled in April 1946 to an obelisk and memorial wall that the British constructed just a year later.

Bergen-Belsen's Jewish memorial

Moshe Kraus, an 84-year-old cantor from Ottawa who recited kaddish at the Jewish memorial almost six decades ago, performed the same task last month, thus coming full circle. A distinctive, diminutive, wizened figure clad in black and sporting a sailor's cap, he looked as if he had been plucked from a Van Gogh painting. Born in what was then Czechoslovakia, Kraus endured three labour camps, two in Germany and one in Yugoslavia, prior to being sent to Bergen-Belsen in the summer of 1944. When he was liberated, he weighed only 36 kilograms. Immigrating to Israel in 1948, he served as the Israeli army's first cantor. After stints as a cantor in Antwerp and Johannesburg, he immigrated to Canada in 1975.

One of his co-survivors, Mania Hudy of Toronto, was born in Warsaw in 1933, the daughter of Leon and Lola Rosman. A feisty woman with sparkling blue eyes and a direct manner, she was saved by a Polish woman who gave her and her mother and brother refuge after the fall of the Warsaw ghetto in 1943. Her father was deported to Theresienstadt and survived, while her younger sister was saved by nuns. Hudy reached Bergen-Belsen in the winter of 1945 and survived, in part, by scraping together potato peelings. After living in Israel and Argentina, she and her family settled in Canada in 1967.

Like almost all the survivors who came to Bergen-Belsen to pay homage to the dead, Manny Langer, 74, was not really at ease in Germany. Yet he harboured no bitterness toward Germans who came of age after the war.

"We're dealing with a new generation of Germans," he said, " but the old generation is a write-off."

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The concept of democracy is ingrained in Israeli society, but in the Arab world it remains elusive and little more than a slogan, an Israeli political scientist says.

Democracy in Israel is a matter of habit, culture, custom and tradition, "like hummus and falafel," Gabriel Ben-Dor of Haifa University said last week in a Harry Posen Memorial Lecture at Holy Blossom Temple. "It's part and parcel of Israel's soul."

But in the Arab world, where not a single genuine democracy exists, the ruling elites have yet to commit themselves to democratic ideas, he said.

Arab leaders and intellectuals are not averse to democracy, but it's not a priority on their agenda, Ben-Dor said.

They would rather deal with such issues as economic development and the Arab-Israeli dispute before experimenting with democracy. For them, democracy is merely a slogan, not a way of life, he said.

He said it is debatable whether democracy can take root in Iraq, a country ruled by Saddam Hussein until U.S. forces toppled him in 2003.

Gabriel Ben-Dor

Democracy in Israel has flourished because Jews have historically associated it with freedom, Ben-Dor noted.

Yet its emergence in Israel may be surprising, he said, for at least two reasons: the eastern European leadership that first dominated the Zionist movement and the state of Israel came from places where democratic traditions were not strong, and many Israelis emigrated from Arab lands, where the absence of democracy is conspicuous.

Ben-Dor warned that anti-democratic theocratic trends, present in certain segments of the Orthodox community, cast a shadow on Israel.

Among Arabs, the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza Strip have a better chance of building democracy than do Arabs elsewhere, he said.

Palestinians have been profoundly impressed by Israel's openness and vitality, but violence, terrorism and incitement do not augur well for the growth of democracy in the Palestinian Authority, he observed.

Ben-Dor said that Lebanon, having rid itself of Syria's army, has a real chance of becoming a democracy.

He suggested that the implantation of democracy in the Middle East is important, because democratic nations do not resolve their disputes through war.

Jerusalem that his office has heard from more than a dozen disappointed would-be Oranim applicants, mostly from Canada.

"We are trying to do our best in order to not leave anybody behind, and we hope to find a solution... As soon as we have the overall solution, we shall announce it."

He noted that Birthright closed registration early for this summer's programs because of an increase in registration and the realization that organizers would not be able to accommodate all applicants. All trip providers knew before registration began how many spots they were allotted, he said.

"I really wanted to see the country," said a disappointed Kelly Levy, who has never been to Israel, but learned about the country as a youngster at United Talmud Torahs in Montreal. "It seemed like the perfect trip."

Finding out she would not be going on Birthright this summer was "a big shock." She said her interviewer left her with the impression she was "definitely in" and told her, "I'll see you in Israel."

"It was very upsetting. I would have gone with CIE [had I known this would happen]." Although she's on Oranim's waiting list for this summer, she said it "doesn't look too optimistic."

Alanna Ross, 19, chose to sign up for Birthright through Oranim on the recommendation of friends who had taken an Oranim trip. She said she could have gotten more shifts at her summer job had she known earlier what her plans would be.

After receiving the initial acceptance letter, she knew she might not get her first choice of dates, but she was "very surprised" not to be accepted at all. Like Levy, Ross said she was also told "I'll see you in Israel" by her interviewer.

Because she understood that applications would be processed in the order they were received, Ross was at her computer as registration began, and later that day paid almost $30 to send her forms and cheques overnight.

Oranim president Shlomo (Momo) Lifshitz declined to speak with The CJN about the situation without direction from Birthright Israel to do so.

The company, he said in an earlier interview, was established 19 years ago and has been organizing Birthright tours since Birthright's inception in 2000.

On Oranim's website, an April 27 letter from Lifshitz, which was also sent to a number of applicants, includes an apology. In it, Lifshitz said that he is sorry he "unable to provide more spaces and for any inconvenience or disappointment this has caused you."

Heschel co-founder honoured by Canadian Friends of Hebrew U

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Prof. Rachael Turkienicz, an educator, lecturer, writer and CJN columnist, has been chosen to receive Canadian Friends of Hebrew University's first-ever Person of Distinction award, at a ceremony to be held May 18 at Adath Israel Synagogue.

Funds raised from the evening will support a doctoral candidate in the field of gender and religion at Hebrew U's Lafer Center for Women and Gender Studies, the first research centre in Israel to be devoted to women's issues.

Prof. Rachael Turkienicz

Joan Stevens, executive director of Canadian Friends of Hebrew U, said Turkienicz was chosen because her innovative approach to Jewish learning has opened doors for children and adults across Toronto and beyond.

In addition to co-founding the Toronto Heschel School, an arts based Jewish day school, she is also on the faculty of education at York University and is the founder of The Learning Centre, an institute for adult Jewish studies in Toronto.

Turkienicz was the first woman to receive a master's degree, and then then the first to receive a doctorate, in Talmud and midrash from Brandeis University.

In an interview at The Learning Centre, Turkienicz said that because she has studied at Hebrew U, and because of her passion for gender studies, she is "doubly" honoured by the award.

When she was at Hebrew U about 20 years ago, toward the end of her undergraduate studies at York University, she attended a class in Talmud studies where there was only one other woman.

They were learning about the Dead Sea Scrolls, she said, and the professor told the class that in order to read two specific scrolls, a mirror was needed because the scrolls had fused together.

"He looked right at me and the other woman and asked if either of us had a mirror. Perhaps he thought it was fortunate that there were two women in the room.

"I don't think he really thought about what he said. I was not slighted."

The movie Yentl, about a girl who disguised herself as a boy in order to study Talmud, came out when she was studying in Israel, Turkienicz said, "and I knew how [the central character] felt. I realize the movie was an exaggeration, but I understood.

"Not only [should it be] permissible for women to study Talmud, [it should] be necessary. Without their participation, religious analysis would remain limited. Texts are enhanced by the insights of each individual, man or woman."

She had a passion for learning texts since she was 14, she said, and she questioned the teacher at her Hebrew day school about why she could not take a Talmud class. "I was eventually allowed to sit behind a divider, silently," she recalled.

"I have always wanted to step into texts with both feet and allow them to lead me. It is a bittersweet experience," she added.

"On the one hand I get excited when I understand a certain point the writer is trying to make. On the other hand, however, I cannot share my excitement with him. I don't have that connection."

Two of her five children are interested in ancient and medieval world battles, she said, "and now they're beginning to wonder how ancient Israel dealt with battles. They are bringing Judaism into a world that fascinates them. To me, that is what should happen."

Opening The Learning Centre five years ago was the culmination of a long-time dream, Turkienicz said. "I want people to learn that messages coming from the ancient world are still relevant today. Jewish learning can be captivating."

She has had different generations of the same family come to take classes, she said, "and each generation hears their perspective in the text. That allows them to see a different view.

"A bond develops when people study together. A conversation can take place without words. I cherish the moments when I see that happen."

JVS awarded seven federal grants

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After completing "unprecedented" work on a new funding application process, JVS Toronto has been awarded seven new federal grants totalling $3.1 million, says Karen Goldenberg, the agency's president and CEO.

Six of the grants are for program areas that include Women in Successful Employment (WISE); employment resource centres at Jane Street and Finch Avenue, and Victoria Park and Sheppard avenues; Youthinc, which helps young people find employment; Pathways to Employment, for immigrants; employment services for people with learning disabilities (in partnership with Alder Centre, which provides employment programs for youth and adults with learning disabilities); and career decision-making workshops.

Goldenberg said JVS is accessible to all residents of Toronto, but it has "a passion to ensure that the Jewish community is served. Our mandate is to serve the whole community, but we make sure that the Jewish community is aware of our services.

"We maintain our relationship with UJA Federation [of Greater Toronto] and keep a real and vibrant connectivity [with the Jewish community]."

The agency exists, she said, "to make sure the best of what we have gets to the Jewish community, but we do help other communities as well."

Goldenberg said the funding process meant JVS had to compete in a publicly advertised call for proposals to secure funds for programs it had been operating for several years.

Last summer and fall, she said, JVS submitted an average of two proposals a week to Human Resources Skills Development Canada, the federal funding arm for employment services.

"We were delighted and surprised to win a substantial number of new programs. Our operating budget in 2004 was $8.3 million. Now it's closer to $11.5 million."

Receiving the grants has enabled JVS to create 30 new jobs at the agency, Goldenberg said. "This was a real vote of confidence on behalf of the government."

On the other hand, however, the agency lost a self-employment program that trained people to run their own businesses, and a re-employment program that many clients of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) were referred to for assessment and recommended for training wherever possible.

North American Jewish federations raise $18 million for JDC disaster relief

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

In the aftermath of the tsunami that devastated Southeast Asia in December, North America's Federation network has raised $18 million for The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee's (JDC) Disaster Response Program.

Of the 60 North American federations that raised money for this cause, Toronto, which raised close to $900,000 in cash, as well as $600,000 in private gifts, ranks second, behind only New York.

Currently, JDC has staff in the four most severely affected countries, where millions have been allocated for emergency relief and assistance activities.

"We now have staff situated on the ground in Sri Lanka, Thailand, Indonesia and India," says JDC spokesman Josh Berkman. "Our representatives are continually meeting with counterparts from NGOs (non-government organizations) in the region to ensure that the North American Jewish community's generosity will have a lasting impact. We have transitioned from addressing immediate relief needs to looking at the longer term challenges the communities in affected areas face. These include training psychologists and social workers, helping with civil infrastructure repair, implementing job training programs, and rebuilding schools, medical clinics and community centres."

In Sri Lanka, JDC is working with the local organization, Sarvodaya, which is addressing the needs of individuals in 20 villages. It has also provided school kits to 2,000 children there. The kits include school uniforms, shoes, socks, school bags, exercise books, pencils and a hygiene kit with soap, toothpaste and a toothbrush.

In the Sri Lankan district of Galle, 30 lower middle class families that are not receiving assistance from any other source are being provided with furniture, bedding, kitchen utensils, cutlery and linens so that they can return to their homes once repairs are completed. JDC is currently looking into the construction of 40 children's playgrounds in the area as well.

In Thailand, JDC is partnering with the local NGO, Population and Community Development Association (PDA) and the Israeli Embassy to provide ten "healing camp" sessions for 500 youth. JDC is also convening five-day trauma seminars to take place in June, which will include local psychologists, health professionals and social workers. JDC and PDA are also rehabilitating the fishing village of Ban Pat, where seafood fishing was the main source of income. School scholarships, meals, clothes, and supplies are now being provided, income-generating activities will be restored, and water, sanitation and waste management services will be reestablished.

In India, JDC and the local NGOs are focusing on providing shelter and reestablishing livelihoods, as well as distributing emergency items to the poor. Five hundred shelters have been constructed in five villages and grants are helping to revive the livelihoods of 1,200 families.

Pharmaceuticals valued at over $300,000 are being distributed to the needy through mobile clinics where 12 Israeli medical and health professionals are serving as volunteers.

Assistance priorities for Indonesia include food production, shelter construction, psychosocial support and the reestablishment of livelihoods.

"This work will continue for a very long time," says Berkman. "The response from our federation partners and thousands of individual donors has put JDC in a position to play an important role in this international effort for the duration."

Adult March of the Living

More than 40 participants from the Greater Toronto Area left Pearson Airport last week on the UJA Federation's Adult March of the Living. In Poland, they joined 18,000 people – most of them teenagers – from around the world where they marched the three kilometers from Auschwitz to Birkenau. In honour of the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz and other concentration camps, this year's Canadian March of the Living contingent - both adults and teenagers - is the largest in the history of the program.

The itinerary also takes participants to Israel for a huge celebration on Yom Ha'atzmaut, marking Israel's 57th Independence Day.

Perspective

Touring two troubled communities

From Lithuania to Argentina - Part II by Harold Wolfe

In this, the second of his two-part series, Harold Wolfe compares the Jewish communities of Vilnius, Lithuania and Buenos Aires, Argentina, which he recently visited on trips facilitated by UJA Federation.

Both Buenos Aires and Vilnius are having difficulties, but for different reasons. Vilnius is a significantly smaller Jewish community, which appears to be aging and must face the possibility that it may not survive. In the case of Buenos Aires, many young and well educated people have thrown in the towel and left and both communities are experiencing leadership challenges.

In Vilnius, the division of the community between the "religious" and "secular" groups is becoming a difficult problem. For example, the government has been returning real estate which was previously removed from the Jewish community, to the "religious" elements. This has caused serious friction and demonstrated the leadership issues which exist there.

The Jewish leadership of Buenos Aires, which had existed until 1994, has ceased. A leadership vacuum has existed for some time, and is only now being filled. Twelve Jewish schools have closed because of Argentina's financial crisis, as has a school to train Jewish teachers. Israel's Bar Ilan University, which operated a branch in Buenos Aires, closed that branch in 2003.

So what is being done to help these communities? In both countries, we were pleased to meet representatives of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC, but often known as "the Joint") and the Jewish Agency - UJA Federation's overseas partners. We were impressed with their well thought out plans.

We visited the Jewish Community Centre in Vilnius, where we observed many elderly Jews receiving groceries supplied by the Joint. We were told that without this help, most of these people could not survive.

The aid being offered in Buenos Aires is extensive. In 2002 alone, the Joint provided $8.76 million of assistance covering financial relief for the elderly, reconstruction of communal infrastructure, small business development and fundraising techniques.

Educational help is being provided by the Jewish Agency, in addition to programs that encourage aliyah. The largest group of olim (immigrants to Israel) is young professionals (doctors, lawyers and engineers). Prior to their departure, jobs in Israel are sourced, so the transition will be as smooth as possible. In Israel, the Jewish Agency also funds, among other initiatives, job training and health insurance.

Both of these visits were very interesting and educational to me. As a result, I decided to see what I could do from Toronto that would help these and other Jewish communities in distress. Therefore, I sought out a representative of UJA Federation who referred me to its Israel and Overseas Committee, which I have now joined. I am looking forward to assisting the committee in its future endeavours.

Reaching out to the Israeli community

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

On this Yom Ha'atzmaut 2005/5765, Jewish Toronto takes a close look at the city's large and growing Israeli community.

An estimated 30,000 Israelis live in the Greater Toronto Area, with the majority residing along the Bathurst corridor north of Wilson, south of Highway 7. As this expanding Israeli community evolves and adapts to the differences in climate, culture and language, the general Jewish community is also learning to engage and reach out to the Israelis who now call Toronto home.

In an effort to better understand Israeli community needs, UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) commissioned a study of Israeli perceptions and attitudes in September of 2004. The findings shed light on the concerns Israelis have about their integration into Canadian society.

"We established that Israelis want to find their rightful place in Toronto," explained Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's Senior Vice President for Jewish Education & Identity. "They want to do it in their way that is not alien to their culture. And we, in the general community, have an obligation to help them."

To that end, UJA developed programs that engage Israelis on their terms. G'sherim, a community association of Israelis in the GTA, has formed a strong relationship with UJA Federation and a deeper connection with the community.

"Federation was very generous to us and gave us funds which we have used for two activities," Orit Schwartz, G'sherim's founding member, explained. "With this money we were able to establish a Toronto branch of the Tzofim, the GTA Israeli Scouts - Shevet Hermon (presently running independently from G'sherim), which are so popular in Israel. We were also able to create programming surrounding Jewish holidays and introduce an adult book club as well as a children's choir."

"With Tzofim we have been able to do several things for the Israeli community living in Toronto," said Chairman Amir Freund. "We are able to offer an activity for children in Hebrew, one that is youth led and one that emphasizes Israeli culture and values."

In addition, BJE is also encouraging other types of integrated programming. Discussions are now under way with Schwartz to create a supplementary school geared toward Israeli children that highlights Israeli culture and Zionist activities. There's also the possibility of developing adult education programs tailored to the needs of this distinct community.

"Israelis have a legitimate place in this community," Epstein said. "And they need to see programs and organizations that reflect their values and concerns, but they will also have to work with the general Jewish community to accomplish this. There are tremendous plans for the future and many reasons to be very hopeful."

Banner year for aliyah

While thousands of Israelis have chosen Toronto as their home, it is a record year for Canadians who are traveling in the other direction.

According to statistics from the Jewish Agency Aliyah Centre in Toronto, 312 Canadians made aliyah in 2004. The numbers will grow this year when approximately 400 Canadians will uproot themselves to create new lives in Israel.

"I've wanted to make aliyah for a long time," explained 25-year-old Sarah Tobe. "I'm finally going to do it this summer with a few of my friends. I have always had a strong connection to Israel and I am very excited about the future."

This July, over 200 Canadian olim will fill one plane to Israel. The Aliyah Centre, in conjunction with Nefesh b'Nefesh, a private organization that helps North American Jews make aliyah, has worked hard to organize such a large contingent and they are thrilled with the outcome.

"This is an amazing experience," said Aliyah Centre director Dina Gidron. "On this plane we will have representatives from the Ministry of Interior and the Ministry of Absorption to help with all the red tape. They will aid all these new immigrants with the process and help them to move things forward."

Darrell Sherman and his wife have always harboured a desire to live in Israel and make it permanent. This summer they too will fulfill that dream and move to Israel with their four children to start a new life filled with varied opportunities.

"For 20 years now we've wanted to do this," Sherman explained. "But with the events in Israel and events worldwide, it increased our desire to be there. Now is the right time."

Ilan Meister from Toronto, along with his wife Toba and their two children, made aliyah two years ago and they are both satisfied with their decision.

"We have been here over two years and things are really going well for us," Meister said. "Starting new and being an immigrant in any country is never easy, but I have always felt that Israel was my home even when I was living in Toronto. All of us here have a mutual relationship with the land," he continued. "It needs us and we very much need it."

The Kruger family from Toronto made aliyah in December of 2004.

All immigrants trying to establish themselves in new countries face the same issues of integration and adjustment. There are different customs and social norms, an alien culture to interpret and, for some, a completely new language to learn. Yet for many immigrants, as essential as it is to fit into their host countries, it is as important to retain their distinct culture, language and values. The multicultural fabric which makes up the city of Toronto allows Israelis to celebrate their culture while adding to the diverse landscape of the city.

Shoshi Olin emigrated to Canada 24 years ago with her husband Oded, whose parents were originally Canadian. Twenty-four years later, Olin's recollections of her first year in Toronto are difficult.

"It was very shocking for us," she explained. "We felt very secluded and were not involved with the community. We went to work and lived our lives. It was important to us to retain our identity as Israelis, to keep our culture, our food, and the way we celebrated holidays. Things are very different today. There is a real shift in the community. You can see an Israeli imprint everywhere, restaurants, music. It's much easier."

Galit and Yosi Kochav-Lev immigrated to Canada almost three years ago and their experience is representative of the change in Toronto presently taking place. Deciding to send their eldest daughter to the Toronto Heschel School, they immediately found a community they could embrace.

"We thought a Jewish day school would be easier for our children because of the Hebrew and it has been a great thing. We also belong to the Village Shul and we have made wonderful friends," Galit Kochav-Lev explained. "Our friends - and most are not Israeli - like us for who we are, and we influence them with our Israeli culture just as much as they influence us."

Over the past few years, the number of Israelis taking up residence in Toronto has grown considerably. The evidence is everywhere with Israeli restaurants, grocery stores, products and crafts filling various areas of the city from downtown to Vaughan.

Kiki Aharonovitch is now studying the multicultural makeup of Toronto in his PhD thesis at Ben-Gurion University. While living in Toronto almost six years ago, he was struck by the diversity of the landscape and the rich multiculturalism that coloured the nature of the city.

"I liked being able to choose my identity at any given time, "Aharonovitch remembered. "I could share my culture as an Israeli with my neighbours who were not Jewish and they loved it. The spirit of tolerance and openness that this city possesses is unique and enables immigrants to celebrate their ethnicities while learning more about others and what they have to offer."

"My daughter still considers herself Israeli," Galit Kochav Lev confided, "and I am glad. I don't want her to forget where she came from and who she is. But we live here now so we need to find a balance and I think we have. Toronto has given us that balance."

Sisters honoured for community work

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

The State of Israel Bonds and Golda Meir Circle honoured two prominent Toronto sisters last week for their dedication to Jewish community work.

Wendy Eisen and Carole Zucker received the Golda Meir Leadership Award, the highest honour given by Israel Bonds and the Golda Meir Circle, a society of women who invest more than $5,000 in Israel Bonds each year.

Eisen and Zucker were raised in a family that valued philanthropy and community work. Both got their start in volunteering through Hadassah with their mother Allie Herman.

"Wendy and I were weaned on the State of Israel," said Zucker, describing their childhood.

Zucker was chair of the Mount Sinai Hospital auxiliary fund in the 1980s, and in 2003 she became co-president of the Israel Cancer Research Fund. She still serves on Mount Sinai's board of directors.

Meanwhile, in the 1970s and '80s, Eisen was involved in the movement to liberate Soviet Jewry. In 1995, she was co-chair of the UJA campaign. She has also led UIA study trips to various countries, including eastern Europe and Argentina. Eisen is currently co-chair of the Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum.

Ninety-four-year-old Bernard Herman, father of Eisen and Zucker, was thrilled that his daughters were being honoured for their work. "I feel a sense of tremendous satisfaction and pride in their accomplishments," he said.

Meir was one of the founders of Israel Bonds in 1951. The award is named after her because of her strength of character and contribution to Israel, said Barbara Bregman, chair of the women's division of State of Israel Bonds.

Carole Zucker and Wendy Eisen

Bregman praised Eisen and Zucker, saying that they "truly emulated the spirit of Golda Meir."

Nearly 250 people attended the lunch. Proceeds will be donated to the Israel Museum and the Israel Cancer Research Fund.

For the first time ever in Canada, representatives from across Israel will converge under one roof to showcase a variety of Israeli real estate projects.

The show, sponsored by The Canadian Jewish News, is taking place at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, 613 Clark Ave. W., May 15, from 10:30 a.m. to 6 p.m.

Gidon Katz, from International Media Placement in Israel, said he expects about 15 exhibitors to attend – realtors, mortgage brokers, bankers, builders, and people selling land in cities including Jerusalem, Tzefat, Netanya, Modiin Illit and Beit Shemesh.

As well, Katz said, representatives from the Jewish Agency for Israel are planning to be on hand to answer questions.

"If you're buying property in Israel, this is the place to be. Everything is under one roof. This will save prospective buyers from having to drag themselves from city to city in Israel looking for appropriate housing."

He said he has received an e-mail from a woman who wants to buy property in Israel and is travelling five hours to attend the show.

"She had heard about similar shows in New York and London, England, but because of a disability, had never been able to travel to one. This is what she has been waiting for."

At the London show, which took place in the fall, Katz said a lot of people attended, and a number of properties were sold at the show.

"People were not only coming to look, they actually wanted to buy. They cared about the bottom line."

Can Hamas be housebroken?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

As the Palestinian Authority elections approach in July, there has been considerable media speculation that Hamas, the Islamic extremist organization that is dedicated to the destruction of Israel, might gain a plurality or even a majority of seats in the Palestinian Legislative Council (PLC), the PA's parliament.

Some analysts have theorized that if Hamas gains membership in the PA's governing structure, it might lead to the reform of Hamas. Others are deeply skeptical.

A recent broadcast of TVO's Diplomatic Immunity (April 29), featured Dennis Ross, former U.S. Mideast peace envoy and now counsellor with the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. Ross adopted a position midway between these opposing views. He described a scenario in which Hamas splits into two factions.

"There is a core of Hamas that is never going to adjust to coexistence [with Israel] and is never going to give up violence," Ross said. "They will give up violence for temporary periods that suit their purposes. But they will not give it up over the long haul." Still, Ross argued, some members of Hamas may be prepared to become "normal parts of the political process and respect the rules."

However, after sketching this possibility, Ross went on to argue that Hamas may in fact be positioning itself to win the elections, "but then not assume any of the ministerial positions, so they can tie the hands of [PA President Mahmoud Abbas] but assume none of the responsibilities." In short, they would manoeuvre a takeover of the PA "without really changing who they are."

Panellist Janice Stein was doubtful that such a development would materialize. She maintained that bringing Hamas into the political "rule-bound" process would be "a very good outcome" and the "only way [Abbas] can move forward."

Patrick Martin, another panellist, predicted that Hamas would do well in the elections, though falling short of winning 50 per cent of the PLC seats. But Martin said that a strong showing by Hamas would, as Stein believes, "increase [Abbas'] bargaining power." He did not elaborate.

Ross nevertheless maintained that if Hamas crosses the 50 per cent "threshold" in the legislative council but rejects ministerial positions, it could very well undermine the PA.

Without a doubt, there will continue to be substantial conjecture about the impact of a strong Hamas election showing. One might bear in mind the words of another Middle East observer, Hisham Melhem, Washington bureau chief for the Lebanese newspaper An-Nahar. In an interview on PBS' NewsHour last month, he reflected on the forthcoming PLC elections and on Abbas' precarious position:

"My fear is that in the next parliamentary elections, Hamas and the Jihad and other Islamist extremist organizations are likely to win at the expense of Mahmoud Abbas. And then [U.S.] President [George W.] Bush will pay for it. The Palestinians will pay for it. The Israelis will pay for it."

* * *

At the close of the TVO program, host Steve Paikin referred to a quote from Ezer Weizman, the recently deceased former Israeli president, about the need to educate people for peace. He asked Ross about such efforts in the broader region.

Ross answered that while Abbas is "beginning" to make such an effort and should be encouraged, "Arab leaders should do it and don't do it at all."

Replied Paikin: "Nobody in the broader Arab world is doing it? Nobody?"

Ross: "Nobody."

He emphasized that the West must focus on the need for Arab leaders to embrace and promote Abbas' words and decry violence as a way to achieve political ends.

"You don't sacrifice the Palestinian cause, but you're not going to achieve it through the use of violence," Ross said.

"We need to hear this echoed by Arab leaders, and we're not."

An upcoming meeting sponsored by National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section (NCJWC-TS) will focus on eating disorders.

The program, Opening our Eyes to Eating Disorders: a Symposium, will take place May 31, 7:30 p.m. at Council House, 4700 Bathurst St. Cost is $10, and refreshments will be served.

The goal of the symposium, says a press release, is "to raise awareness in the community about eating disorders and encourage dialogue as we dispel fears and misconceptions." The organization believes that "through education, the stigma and myths surrounding this topic" can be eradicated.

A panel will consist of Dr. Allan Kaplan, director of the eating disorders program at Toronto General Hospital; Jennifer Mills, assistant professor of psychology at York University, whose research interests include the factors that influence women to continue dieting and the effect of media on body image; and Liza Finlay, a journalist who has recovered after a long bout with a food disorder. A question and answer period will follow.

The impetus for choosing this topic came both from the organization itself and from requests at previous symposia.

Jewish education: before the Shoah and today

By PEGGY KLEINPLATZ

Guest Voice

Earlier in the year, in commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, Mireille Silcoff wrote a powerful article in the National Post titled "Only the deaths, not the lives"(January 25).

She wrote of her visit to Poland: "I think of the money that had been poured into making Auschwitz a museum, and about the old synagogues I had seen in Krakow, built many hundreds of years ago, all falling to pieces for lack of funding and thinly visited by tourists." She adds later: "I should like to remember the victims of the Holocaust as human beings who had lives lived richly, often against all odds – for this is the truth."

The Ontario high school history curriculum calls for students to study Auschwitz as the example par excellence of genocide. But as Silcoff noted, the study of the lives of Jews of eastern Europe for centuries prior to the Shoah has been neglected.

> 'Most of us know too little about our heritage'

How is it then that Silcoff made a point to visit Krakow and picked up on, "All those doorways branded with a diagonal darkness where a mezuzah used to be"? Perhaps the answer is in an offhand comment in Silcoff's article: "I have been through the Jewish school system."

Silcoff's article moved me on several levels. My parents survived the Shoah, between them Auschwitz, Bergen- Belsen, Buchenwald and Theresienstadt. Most of their families did not. Talking about the death camps was not easy for them, though they rarely refused to answer my questions. More importantly, they taught me as much as they could about the world of their births and of my legacy.

My mother came from Pabianice, a suburb of Lodz, a metropolis considerably larger than Ottawa. She went to school in Krakow, in the very first Bais Yaakov seminary, in the assumption that nothing could be more important, for boys or girls, than solid grounding in the foundations of Jewish knowledge. My father came from a small town at the other end of Poland named Stopnic. The nearest major city was Kelc. He, too, would detail the long days of secular and Jewish study – all paid for by the Polish government and with the expectation that Jews would never attend school on Shabbat and Jewish holidays while Catholics were free from school on Sundays and other religious observances. (This in no way diminished the beatings my father withstood on the way home from school daily.)

Notwithstanding the difference in their backgrounds, they both described lives rich in Jewish art, music, dance, literature, architecture and scholarship. They would speak vividly of the 70 or so travelling Jewish/Yiddish theatre troupes throughout the country (contrasting sadly with the one permanent Canadian Yiddish theatre group, founded by Dora Wasserman, at the Saidye Bronfman Centre in Montreal).

They would describe the joy of having their homes filled every Shabbat with travelling klezmer musicians or scholars far from home. Hachnasat Orchim was the rule – not the exception. Dozens of Jewish/Yiddish newspapers were readily available. The vigorous debates about the future of Judaism did not seem to diminish from the nature of the commonalities among Jews – on the contrary, such debates have always been the essence of Jewish thinking.

> 'If we are serious about Jewish continuity, we must teach our children'

(Today, when people ask if I am an Orthodox, Conservative, Reform or Reconstructionist Jew, I like to respond that I am pre-denominational, paying homage to a world prior to our current distinctions and the divisiveness that often accompanies them.)

Silcoff is correct: most of us know too little about our heritage. As such, we are forced to reinvent Judaism.

For example, the problem of the agunot, women stuck in limbo between marriage and a husband who is either unable or unwilling to provide a get, (a Jewish divorce decree) is a rather serious and disconcerting one for Jewish women in North America today.

When I asked my parents how this problem was dealt with in their world, they responded that arranging for a get was no simple matter; it could not be resolved by an ordinary beit din comprising three members. On the contrary, it required a special assembly of 100 rabbis. However, as my mother pointed out, gathering 100 rabbis together in the vicinity of Lodz was hardly an insurmountable obstacle. It might not happen overnight and was never treated casually but typically could be arranged "in a few months."

Today, we continue to live a diaspora on many levels. We have been rootless for thousands of years and now, although we have a national home in Israel, much of our heritage has been destroyed. Those survivors who are still alive are treasures, and we must not waste a moment in learning whatever we can about their everyday and extraordinary lives prior to the Shoah.

But to go back to Silcoff, no, I do not think it coincidence that she attended to the crumbling, darkened doorways of Krakow rather than only the horrors of Auschwitz. Silcoff is the product of Jewish elementary and high school education in Montreal. So am I.

Of all the gifts my parents gave me, a Jewish education is among those I cherish most. I long deeply for all our children to have access to the kind of education that came formally and via osmosis in the world of my parents. That will never be. But the least we can do is provide as much high quality Jewish education as we can for every child in our community and in all our communities. If we are serious about Jewish continuity, we must teach our children of our rich legacy with intensity of purpose, with love and pride.

This June, my son will graduate from Hillel Academy and, God willing, will join his sister at Yitzhak Rabin High School here in Ottawa in September. Please consider that if we are to be worthy of our inheritance, we must transmit it to our children with its full vibrancy and meaning.

Novel explores aftermath of 9/11

Extremely Loud & Incredibly Close by Jonathan Safran Foer, Houghton Miffin Company.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This eagerly awaited second novel by 28-year-old, Jewish-American, Jonathan Safran Forer, following the dazzling success of Everything Is Illuminated, is everything his many admirers hoped it would be: innovative, ambitious, wistful, tragic and ingeniously imaginative.

Oscar Schell, the book's nine-year- old protagonist, is precocious beyond belief. His business card – yes, he has one – lists some of his interests: "Inventor, Jewelry Designer, Jewelry Fabricator, Amateur Entomologist, Francophile, Vegan, Origamist, Pacifist, Percussionist, Amateur Astronomer, Computer Consultant, Amateur Archeologist, Collector of rare coins, butterflies that died natural deaths, miniature cacti, Beatles memorabilia and semiprecious stones."

He also peppers the renowned physicist Stephen Hawking with numerous letters that are never answered and defiantly goes about shaking his ever-present tambourine.

One day, rummaging in his father's closet, he finds an envelope that bears the name "Black" and contains a key. The indomitable Oscar determines to visit the 216 different addresses listed in the phone book under the name "Black." Perhaps the key will unlock some mystery about his father's life and fate.

His odyssey leads him to a variety of eccentrics. They include a reclusive centenarian journalist, a nameless stranger who occupies a room in his grandmother's nearby apartment and a tour guide who never leaves the Empire State Building. His search for the elusive lock careens from Central Park to Coney Island to the Bronx.

Another narrative thread involves Oscar's grandparents who survived the allied bombing of Dresden in World War II. The terrifying raid is described in vivid and appalling detail.

A surprising feature of the book is the variety of interpolated illustrations that depict the objects of Oscar's concern. They include photographs of fingerprints, back of heads, turtles mating and African masks. A body falling from the Trade Center tower illustrates a series of pages. Surprisingly, the pages are presented in reverse order, so that the body appears to be rising rather then falling. This symbolism is open to a wide variety of interpretations.

In the end, Oscar discovers the secret of the key and is exhilarated by the long- awaited letter from Stephen Hawking.

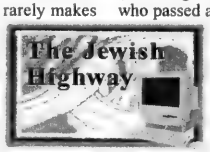
Foer's complex themes include sorrow, guilt, the pitfalls of human communication and the need for affection and community.

Some readers, undoubtedly, will find tedious the long stream-of-consciousness passages that contain a minimum of punctuation or paragraphs.

In a recent interview, the author indicated that he wrote 39 drafts of the book before he was satisfied. This novel is a tour de force that, in a manner challenging and wise, approaches both tragic historical events and matters of the human heart with humour, awe, tenderness and stunning virtuosity.

Eurovision: Hits of the Past

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ



Eurovision is:

(A) A new satellite TV station from Brussels

(B) Revolutionary laser eye surgery from Zurich

(C) A European song contest that Israel has won three times.

If you guessed (C), you are correct. Even though Eurovision rarely makes a blip in North America, if you're a fan of Israeli music, you'll certainly recognize some of the songs that got their start at this competition. Later this month, Israel will try for its fourth win but first let's look back at Israel's winning entries and some of the controversies that have dogged Israel as it has performed on the international stage.

Ilanit was the first singer to represent Israel at the 18th Eurovision Song Contest in 1973.

The competition took place in Luxembourg that year and to accommodate the heavy security, all leave was suspended for the country's police and soldiers. According to the official Eurovision website, Ilanit performed the song Ey Sham while wearing a bulletproof vest. She finished fourth. [www.eurovision.tv/english/1272.htm] The Israel Broadcasting Authority has put together a very good multimedia website that lets you watch all the Israeli Eurovision entries going back to 1973 as well as this year's international nominees. [http://tinyurl.com/679t8]

Israel won its first Eurovision at the 1978 competition in Paris with A-Ba-Ni-Bi. Sung by Izhar Cohen and Alpha-Beta, the lively tune tells how two young people express their love using their own "secret" form of Hebrew: [www.geocities.com/SunsetStrip/Arena/2013/]

You can watch a performance of A-Ba-Ni-Bi online. [http://tinyurl.com/7clog] (The song was written by Ehud Manor who passed away recently at the age of 64. Manor was a prolific songwriter whose works include the popular Bashana Haba'a. [http://tinyurl.com/8gxj5])

Although Israelis were thrilled with their Eurovision win, the same could not be said about some of their neighbours. When it became apparent that Israel was going to win, Jordan television switched off its live broadcast of the competition. [www.eurovision.tv/english/history_1978_paris.htm]

This was not the last time that politics has entered the competition. In 2000, the Israeli group Ping Pong caused a furor in Stockholm when they unfurled a Syrian flag as a sign of peace. (They finished 22nd.) Two years later, a boycott was launched to keep Israel out of Eurovision. [http://tinyurl.com/b9qx2] The boycott was unsuccessful but when Israel's Sarit Hadad performed the song Light a Candle [http://tinyurl.com/bll5m] at that year's competition, a Swedish presenter told his viewers that Israel was not getting his vote "because of what it is doing to the Palestinians." Following the uproar, Sweden's ambassador to Israel met with Hadad and apologized for the statement. [http://tinyurl.com/8d3m2]

Since Israel had won with the song A-Ba-Ni-Bi in 1978, the country was given the opportunity of the hosting the following year's competition, which it did from Jerusalem. [http://tinyurl.com/aj4hu] And Israel pulled off a coup by winning again this time before a hometown crowd with the very memorable "Hallelujah" performed by Gila Atari and the band Halav Udvash. [http://tinyurl.com/8whvo] Israel didn't host - or participate in - the competition the following year because it fell on Yom Hashoah.

After its 1979 success, Israel spent a few years out of the winner's circle until 1998. That's when a singer named Dana International scored big with her song Diva. [http://tinyurl.com/7hm7r] The win was controversial because until a sex-change operation five years earlier, Dana had been a man named Yaron Cohen. When Reuters asked Binyamin Netanyahu if he was having a hard time coping with the win by Ms. International, the prime minister responded: "Why? I listened and hummed like the rest of the public." [http://tinyurl.com/a5l2a] Jerusalem's Deputy Mayor Haim Miller, on the other hand, was outraged and pledged that the following year's competition would not take place in Jerusalem. [http://tinyurl.com/925fh] It did.

Although Israel has sent off delegations since its last win in 1998, it hasn't been able to nudge past fifth place. Next week, we'll look at Israel's chances at this month's competition in Kiev, explain why TWO countries are being represented by Israeli singers – and find out which other Eurovision country is using Hasidic-type dancers in its entry – black hats, payis and all.

Yom Hashoah

Survivors pass on 'torch of remembrance'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

As members of the Canadian Parachute Battalion 60 years ago, Ronald Ford (Andy) Anderson and his fellow paratroopers happened on the concentration camp Bergen Belsen, en route to capture the city of Wismar on the Baltic Sea.

"The reality of this situation was to change our lives, our world, and inhabit our nightmares for the rest of our lives," the World War II veteran told a capacity crowd at Earl Bales Park last week. "We have but to close our eyes today to see the living sorrow, to hear the anguished cries and the smell of death we encountered that day."

More than 2,200 people gathered last Thursday night under a large white tent for a community Holocaust commemoration for Yom Hashoah and the 60th anniversary of liberation and the end of the war.

Anderson, the keynote speaker, now in his early 80s, said he and the others were "young, battle-hardened paratroopers in good physical condition. We could not fathom the situation that could cause so [many] tragic souls to be so close to death. We had no knowledge of the global situation. We had never heard of the word Holocaust or concentration camp."

His platoon didn't enter the camp, he said. Medics and doctors were moved up to assist. "The rest of us did what little we could... The need was so massive that the medical and other units of the American Ninth Army were called forward. They were only a few miles [away]."

But those medical teams lost an average of 215 souls a day, he said. "It was heartbreaking for all of us to think that so many had lived to see liberation only to die from the terrible effects of man's inhumanity to man."

His battalion did not celebrate the end of the war, he said, but instead held a non-denominational church service to pray for the victims of Bergen Belsen and 462 of their own members whom they had lost.

Holocaust survivor Gerda Frieberg reflected on her liberation from the Sudetenland concentration camp and the sobering aftermath when initial hugs and tears of joy gave way to sadness as reality set in.

"We were free, but we didn't know the fate of our loved ones," she said. "We were too sick, too weak, too grief-stricken to celebrate victory, engulfed by terrible loneliness, surrounded by an indifferent world that had shut its eyes to our suffering."

While the world celebrated the end of the war and soldiers went home to their families, Holocaust survivors had no place to go, said Frieberg. "For four years I desperately tried to leave the blood-soaked soil of Germany.

"We became refugees that nobody wanted... Our very presence was upsetting, embarrassing. Our survival was a matter of resentment, for we possessed the truth the world tried to forget. Survivors remained silent for fear of arousing disbelief."

Although they rebuilt their lives, their laughter and tears were not the same as those of their neighbours, she said.

"Now we pass the torch of remembrance to the future generations. The victims of the Shoah must never be forgotten."

Ronald Ford (Andy) Anderson was keynote speaker at Yom Hashoah program at Earl Bales Park. [Stephen Epstein/Big Dipper Communications photo]

The moving ceremony, sponsored by more than a dozen community organizations including the Board of Jewish Education and the Holocaust Centre of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, also included remarks by Ya'acov Brosh, consul general of Israel, and MPP Monte Kwinter on behalf of Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty.

Rabbi Mendel Kaplan of Chabad of Flamingo and Rabbi Daniel Komito Gottlieb of Temple Kol Ami did readings, and Cantor Ben Silverberg of Shaar Shalom Synagogue recited the K'el Maleh Rachamim, and Holocaust survivor Mike Englishman recited the Kaddish.

Other participants in the 1¾-hour-long program included young singers Yehezkel Lipinsky and Robbie Wulfsohn, families who lit commemorative candles, students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, General Wingate Branch 256 Royal Canadian Legion, Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Toronto Post, and GTA Israeli Scouts (Shevet Hermon).

Megillat Hashoah records events of the tragic past

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

By reading Megillat Hashoah on Yom Hashoah we can commemorate the Holocaust with a fixed Jewish ritual, said Rabbi Howard Morrison, spiritual leader of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation, at the synagogue's memorial ceremony.

Megillat Hashoah, inspired by Alex Eisen, a member of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, and Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of that congregation, is a liturgical text written in six chapters.

Published by the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies and the Rabbinical Assembly, the megillah was edited by Prof. David Golinkin, president of the Schechter Institute, and Rabbi Scheim.

Last year, the text was read in more than 80 synagogues worldwide as part of Yom Hashoah events. An all-Hebrew edition and a Hebrew-French edition have been written.

For the past two years in Toronto, it has been read at Beth David, but Beth Emeth held the third annual service last week to commemorate the 60th anniversary of liberation, and the 50th anniversary of the synagogue's founding.

Rabbi Scheim said at the service that Megillat Hashoah brings to the synagogue events of the tragic past that we cannot let the world forget.

"The readings attest to the spiritual resiliency of our people," he said.

In the text accompanying the megillah, Rabbi Scheim paid tribute to Eisen for proposing the idea. "He felt, correctly, that a consistent approach to Yom Hashoah would provide the day with a unifying structure."

The service, which began with a procession of flag and torch bearers, included alternate readings from Megillat Hashoah in Hebrew and English, songs, prayers and candle-lighting.

Cantor Marshall Loomer of Beth David read in Hebrew: "For these do I weep: for the millions crowded in ghettos and in detention camps; for those who died of hunger and of thirst, smothered to death in freight trains or in gas chambers, shot, buried alive or cremated; for those who lost their homes, their dignity and their hope; and for those left alive to live the horror anew, day after day, moment after moment... For all these do I weep."

One chapter of Megillat Hashoah contains the notes found written upon scraps of paper between two wooden beds in a concentration camp. "What cruel, callous magnet drew us here from all corners of the continent and cast us all into one mould: sodden shoes and a dress of coarse fabric, a blanket to cover our body in a cold that knows no mercy, and a tin plate and spoon that never could hold enough to satisfy the incessant gnawing hunger.

"The present fills all our existence. About the past no one talks and with difficulty I remember the future. I am writing all this on scraps of paper and if a human being should ever find them, perhaps he will have the strength to ask for a reason why there was no..." (The text was not finished.)

Cantor Loomer recited Ani Ma'amin; Cantor Louis Danto sang Undzer Shtetl Brent and Zog nit Keyn Mol; and Cantor Aaron Bensoussan sang Eili, Eili and recited K'El Maleh Rachamim.

Anderson, the keynote speaker, now in his early 80s, said he and the others were "young, battle-hardened paratroopers in good physical condition. We could not fathom the situation that could cause so [many] tragic souls to be so close to death. We had no knowledge of the global situation. We had never heard of the word Holocaust or concentration camp."

His platoon didn't enter the camp, he said. Medics and doctors were moved up to assist. "The rest of us did what little we could... The need was so massive that the medical and other units of the American Ninth Army were called forward. They were only a few miles [away]."

But those medical teams lost an average of 215 souls a day, he said. "It was heartbreaking for all of us to think that so many had lived to see liberation only to die from the terrible effects of man's inhumanity to man."

His battalion did not celebrate the end of the war, he said, but instead held a non-denominational church service to pray for the victims of Bergen Belsen and 462 of their own members whom they had lost.

Holocaust survivor Gerda Frieberg reflected on her liberation from the Sudetenland concentration camp and the sobering aftermath when initial hugs and tears of joy gave way to sadness as reality set in.

"We were free, but we didn't know the fate of our loved ones," she said. "We were too sick, too weak, too grief-stricken to celebrate victory, engulfed by terrible loneliness, surrounded by an indifferent world that had shut its eyes to our suffering."

While the world celebrated the end of the war and soldiers went home to their families, Holocaust survivors had no place to go, said Frieberg. "For four years I desperately tried to leave the blood-soaked soil of Germany.

"We became refugees that nobody wanted... Our very presence was upsetting, embarrassing. Our survival was a matter of resentment, for we possessed the truth the world tried to forget. Survivors remained silent for fear of arousing disbelief."

Although they rebuilt their lives, their laughter and tears were not the same as those of their neighbours, she said.

"Now we pass the torch of remembrance to the future generations. The victims of the Shoah must never be forgotten."

The moving ceremony, sponsored by more than a dozen community organizations including the Board of Jewish Education and the Holocaust Centre of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, also included remarks by Ya'acov Brosh, consul general of Israel, and MPP Monte Kwinter on behalf of Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty.

Rabbi Mendel Kaplan of Chabad of Flamingo and Rabbi Daniel Komito Gottlieb of Temple Kol Ami did readings, and Cantor Ben Silverberg of Shaar Shalom Synagogue recited the K'el Maleh Rachamim, and Holocaust survivor Mike Englishman recited the Kaddish.

Other participants in the 1¾-hour-long program included young singers Yehezkel Lipinsky and Robbie Wulfsohn, families who lit commemorative candles, students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, General Wingate Branch 256 Royal Canadian Legion, Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Toronto Post, and GTA Israeli Scouts (Shevet Hermon).

Megillat Hashoah records events of the tragic past

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

By reading Megillat Hashoah on Yom Hashoah we can commemorate the Holocaust with a fixed Jewish ritual, said Rabbi Howard Morrison, spiritual leader of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation, at the synagogue's memorial ceremony.

Megillat Hashoah, inspired by Alex Eisen, a member of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, and Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of that congregation, is a liturgical text written in six chapters.

Published by the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies and the Rabbinical Assembly, the megillah was edited by Prof. David Golinkin, president of the Schechter Institute, and Rabbi Scheim.

Last year, the text was read in more than 80 synagogues worldwide as part of Yom Hashoah events. An all-Hebrew edition and a Hebrew-French edition have been written.

For the past two years in Toronto, it has been read at Beth David, but Beth Emeth held the third annual service last week to commemorate the 60th anniversary of liberation, and the 50th anniversary of the synagogue's founding.

Rabbi Scheim said at the service that Megillat Hashoah brings to the synagogue events of the tragic past that we cannot let the world forget.

"The readings attest to the spiritual resiliency of our people," he said.

In the text accompanying the megillah, Rabbi Scheim paid tribute to Eisen for proposing the idea. "He felt, correctly, that a consistent approach to Yom Hashoah would provide the day with a unifying structure."

The service, which began with a procession of flag and torch bearers, included alternate readings from Megillat Hashoah in Hebrew and English, songs, prayers and candle-lighting.

Cantor Marshall Loomer of Beth David read in Hebrew: "For these do I weep: for the millions crowded in ghettos and in detention camps; for those who died of hunger and of thirst, smothered to death in freight trains or in gas chambers, shot, buried alive or cremated; for those who lost their homes, their dignity and their hope; and for those left alive to live the horror anew, day after day, moment after moment... For all these do I weep."

One chapter of Megillat Hashoah contains the notes found written upon scraps of paper between two wooden beds in a concentration camp. "What cruel, callous magnet drew us here from all corners of the continent and cast us all into one mould: sodden shoes and a dress of coarse fabric, a blanket to cover our body in a cold that knows no mercy, and a tin plate and spoon that never could hold enough to satisfy the incessant gnawing hunger.

"The present fills all our existence. About the past no one talks and with difficulty I remember the future. I am writing all this on scraps of paper and if a human being should ever find them, perhaps he will have the strength to ask for a reason why there was no..." (The text was not finished.)

Cantor Loomer recited Ani Ma'amin; Cantor Louis Danto sang Undzer Shtetl Brent and Zog nit Keyn Mol; and Cantor Aaron Bensoussan sang Eili, Eili and recited K'El Maleh Rachamim.

'We will not forget,' says Canada's PM

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Representatives of 50 countries joined members of Parliament, senators and hundreds of Jews on the grounds of Parliament Hill last week to remember those killed in the Holocaust and to mark the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II in Europe.

Prime Minister Paul Martin spoke of his youth in Windsor and recalled visiting the homes of his Jewish friends and being shown photo albums by their parents, "albums of families lost in the Holocaust."

Martin was echoing the sentiments of Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz of Montreal's Congregation Beth Tikvah, who said in his d'var Torah: "We mourn individuals, each having a name. We remember and we recall each and every person and we multiply the pain suffered by each person six million times."

Said Martin, "We will not forget. We will look above when the evening comes and we will behold six million stars shining bright and each of them with a name… We must remember, for this is our duty."

Alan Baker, Israel's ambassador to Canada, told the May 5 gathering about his fear that hatred, intolerance and anti-Semitism still abound.

"The fact that I am able to be here and to represent the State of Israel in Canada is perhaps the true answer to the Shoah and the hope of the Jewish people," he said.

Conservative leader Stephen Harper said that it's "hard, even after 60 years, to comprehend the magnitude and malevolence of this slaughter." He, too, called for vigilance to ensure that such a thing will never occur again.

"It is not our words, but our vigilance in our actions that will make our memory meaningful," he said.

Gilles Duceppe, leader of the Bloc Quebecois, said that "each member of the human community is responsible and has the duty of memory."

NDP leader Jack Layton stressed the same theme: "It is our duty to remember so that our world will never again know the worst that humanity is capable of, but rather will rejoice in the peace and the hope for a joyful tomorrow."

Journalist and broadcaster Joe Schlesinger, a Holocaust survivor, cautioned that despite calls of "Never again," the world has "had no end of violence and oppression since 1945," citing Darfur, Zimbabwe, Chechnya and Iraq as examples.

Anti-Semitism is also rearing its ugly head. "The recent rise of racist acts in Canada is troubling. We know how hate, left unchecked, can metastasize," Schlesinger said. "It is up to us, to people of goodwill, to check it."

Schlesinger urged that we all follow the lesson of Dutch Jewish diarist Anne Frank in looking for the good in people, no matter how difficult it may be.

"If there is anything the Holocaust has taught us, it is that it is our sacred duty… to foster mutual understanding and tolerance and to nurture the good that lies in all of us," he said.

Former deputy prime minister Herb Gray, MC of last week's event, said that prior to the passage of Bill C-459 by an all-party consensus in 2003 – proclaiming a national Holocaust Remembrance Day – the Canadian Jewish community mourned the Shoah largely by itself.

Now it has been joined by all Canadians, he noted.

Wreaths were laid by the eternal flame by groups of Holocaust survivors accompanied by members of Parliament.

After a moment of silence, as well as the chanting of Kel Maleh Rachamim by Cantor Louis Danto and the recitation of Kaddish led by Cantor Moshe Kraus, the ceremony concluded with the blowing of three shofars, one each by Rabbi Arnold Fine, Cantor Daniel Benlolo and a student. The Shira Ottawa Choir sang and the Ottawa Jewish War Veterans marched off the colours.

Montreal mayor reads Holocaust victims' names

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – "Vigdor Vainshtein, born Poland, died in 1942 in Treblinka, age 10. Mikhl Vainshtein, born Poland, died in 1942 in Treblinka, age 9. Ida Vainshtein, born Poland, died 1942 in Treblinka."

Montreal Mayor Gerald Tremblay read out in total 26 names of Holocaust victims as he stood outside at the entrance to city hall, taking his turn with Vanier College students who, from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. on Yom Hashoah, recited the vital statistics of approximately 6,000 of the six million Jews who perished.

They ranged in age from one to 17. Some, like the Vainshteins, were members of families annihilated.

There were no speeches, just a steady, chilling litany as a dozen teens, only one of them Jewish, took turns at the microphone, standing in front of six memorial candles. The event, called Unto Every Person There Is A Name, was organized by B'nai Brith Canada. The students were those of Jack Hirschberg, who teaches a course called cultural psychology and is a child of concentration camp survivors.

Tremblay, a man known for containing his emotions, said afterward that he did have difficulty maintaining his composure. "These could have been my children, and they just disappeared for no reason at all. It was an honour and privilege to take part in this," he said.

Tremblay said he and the city council readily agreed to allow the event to be held on the steps of city hall all day because "the public has to realize it is important to remember this tragic event and, most of all, to ensure that it never happens again. We also have to show our values of love, justice and peace, and we were far from those values in 1941 and '42.

Tremblay shook hands with each of the students and hugged Dida Berku, the independent city councillor who proposed the Yom Hashoah motion adopted at the last city council meeting. Berku's father was a survivor of the June 1941 pogrom in Iasi, Romania. "He was one of the few survivors among the 10,000 or 11,000 killed. He was put on a cattle car, crammed with people with no food or water for 72 hours, yet he managed to live because he had a sugar cube. But then they made him bury the dead in mass graves."

What troubled him the most, though, was that it was people who he thought were his friends, young men he played soccer with, who denounced him as a Jew, she said.

One of the students, Kim Pasquele, 18, said she was pleased that some passersby stopped to listen or ask questions. A few even accepted the flyers the students handed out.

Asked why someone her age, who is not Jewish, would choose to do this, Pasquele said, "We've heard so much about the Holocaust, seen movies and read stories about it, but when you call out those names it makes realize this could happen to any innocent person.

"I feel it's the least we can do now; we can't go back in time."

One of the stories the 40 students in Hirschberg's class hear about is how his Polish-born mother and father survived, respectively, Auschwitz and Mauthausen, lost the spouses and children they had before the war, and met each other afterward in a displaced persons camp in Munich. His mother had been subjected to experimentation by Josef Mengele and thought she was sterile. When she became pregnant, it was thought she had a tumour. "Nine months later, in 1947, that tumour was born – it was me," said Hirschberg. His mother Sarah, who lost 3,000 members of her large extended family, is 92 today.

The Holocaust figures prominently in the course, which examines such issues as inter-community relations and how intolerance and hate can flourish, and why some people resist or take risks to help others.

"They learn that each little thing they do to fight racism does make a difference. If it hadn't been exam time, all 40 of them would be here," he said. "I consider it a blessing that I can teach these young people how to recognize intolerance and hate, and what to do about it."

B'nai Brith regional director Bill Surkis said the Unto Every Person There Is A Name project is intended to "personalize the enormity of the Shoah because the figure six million is more than people can comprehend.

"We've calculated that to read all six million names, it would take two years, and that's reading seven days a week, 24 hours a day." The information used came from Yad Vashem, he said.

Surkis said the purpose was also to "make certain that the slogan 'Never Again' is not merely a slogan" and warned that even as these names were being read, a genocide was taking place in the Darfur region of Sudan, with the death toll now having reached, according to best knowledge, 400,000. "The world has to take responsibility," he said.

Surkis said the mayor and city council immediately agreed to allow the event to take place and provide the microphone and sound system.

As a sign of respect, the municipal blue-collar workers' union agreed to Surkis' request not to hold their weekly noisy demonstration outside city hall to press their grievances, but instead watched quietly from across the street.

Despite the goodwill shown that day, Surkis said his office still receives frequent calls from those who deny the Holocaust or who are hostile to its commemoration.

Flemish masterpiece among art looted by Nazis

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – A very valuable painting by Flemish master Jan Brueghel (1568-1625) is among the works once owned by the late Montreal art dealer Max Stern that fell into Nazi hands and are the subject of restitution claims by the executors of his estate.

At a press conference at the Quebec delegation office last month in London, art investigator Clarence Epstein of Concordia University publicly identified for the first time four of the more than 250 artworks that the Nazis are known to have either confiscated from Stern or forced him to sell in the 1930s. They were from his gallery in Dusseldorf, Germany, and his private collection.

Epstein could pinpoint the exact worth of Brueghel's Still Life With Flowers. "It's hard to say, but Brueghels like that are running into the millions. It depends on its condition," he told The CJN.

Epstein is director of special projects in the office of Concordia's president and special advisor to the Stern estate, which contained a huge art collection, amassed after Stern re-established himself in Canada.

Concordia is acting on behalf of executors and two other universities that were the estate's chief beneficiaries, McGill University and Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

The other Nazi-confiscated works that Epstein named in London are the paintings St. Jerome by Lodovico Carracci (1555-1619), Bagpiper by Utrechter Meister (painted in 1632), and Lucretia by Panfilo Nuvolone (1608-1665).

Epstein said he chose these works to indicate the quality and variety of the lost art, but they do not necessarily have the highest value of Stern's pre-war holdings.

Epstein and his team have so far tracked down six of the 250 seized works – five are in Europe (in England, Holland and Germany) and one is in the United States. Their titles won't be made public until the estate's claims have been successfully negotiated, he said. The works are now in the possession of both institutions and individuals.

Once owned by Montreal art dealer

Stern owned the Dominion Gallery from 1947, after previously managing it for five years, until his death in 1987. In its heyday, it was one of Canada's most important galleries.

As per his wishes, the gallery continued to operate after his death from its landmark three-storey greystone on Sherbrooke Street, until 2000, when the collection was liquidated after the building and gallery name were sold.

At the press conference, Epstein also described Stern's attempts to recover his holdings after the war. He initiated proceedings in Germany in 1946, which led to the recovery of 14 paintings. Also at that time, he went to England to regain possession of several works that had been stored at Barclays Bank.

As part of the celebration of the centenary of his birth, a biography of Stern has been commissioned to be written by a senior curator at the National Gallery of Canada, where his archives were deposited.

These archives show that the Canadian military recovered Musical Party by Dirk Hals (1591-1656) and returned it to Stern in 1948. Felsenmotiv by Joos de Momper (1564-1634) was returned the following year.

Epstein is working closely with the Art Loss Register in London, the Commission for Looted Art in Europe, the Holocaust Claims Processing Office of the New York State Banking Commission, as well as international auction houses.

"Based on our preliminary research, we believe that the majority of the works will turn up in Europe and we are appealing to members of the art trade, museums and private collectors, who are aware that they are in possession of these works or who will be notified by us in the future, to do the right thing and return the works to their rightful owner," Epstein said in London.

The executors and beneficiaries hope to avoid using the courts, he said.

"We must all remember that Dr. Stern's personal and professional life were utterly shattered by the Nazis, yet he had the courage and the strength to start over after the war and, together with Iris, built the foremost art gallery in Canada," Epstein said.

Starting in 1913, the Julius Stern Gallery in Dusseldorf specialized in Dutch and Flemish Old Masters and German painting. Max Stern assumed ownership of the gallery upon his father's death in 1934, and the Nazi government soon began to pressure him to cease operations because he was Jewish.

"Stern was forced to make irrational decisions concerning his business and was left with no choice by 1937 but to consign most of his inventory and private collection to Lempertz auction house in Cologne and store the remainder of his holdings with a local shipper," Epstein said.

Stern fled to Paris with only a suitcase and soon left for England, where he operated West's Galleries on Duke Street in London, a short distance from where Epstein held the press conference.

Hamilton Jews, Muslims call for action in Darfur

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — The 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz in January and preparations for a March of the Living trip this week have had cardiologist Lorne Finkelstein thinking about the situation in the Darfur province of Sudan.

Finkelstein is a member of Strengthening Hamilton Communities Initiative, an organization of community leaders formed after Sept. 11 to combat racism in Hamilton. He teamed up with another member, Javid Mirza, president of the Hamilton Muslim Association, to organize Action for Darfur.

About 400 people packed the Hamilton Convention Centre April 28 to hear speakers Mohamed Hassan Haroun and Tragi Mustafa, who both emigrated from Sudan; Norman Epstein, founder and co-chair of Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan (CASTS); and Senator Mobina Jaffer, an African of east Indian descent who in 2002 was named Canada's special envoy to the peace process in Sudan.

"I hope people go home and talk to their friends and start petitions. Contact their MPs, the prime minister, the Foreign Affairs Minister," Finkelstein told the audience. "What have we learned from the Holocaust? We can't just sit quietly.

"Canada must act. The United Nations is impotent about most things and certainly about this."

In Darfur, an area of western Sudan, government-backed militias known as the Janjaweed are systematically eliminating entire communities of African tribal farmers.

While there are conflicting reports of the number dead, Epstein said recent authoritative research shows close to 400,000 have died from violence and famine, while more than 1.6 million people have been displaced from their homes and more than 200,000 have fled to neighbouring Chad.

The Muslim and Jewish communities in Hamilton have been working together to promote peace and understanding locally, as well as on action for Darfur.

In March, Temple Anshe Shalom devoted a Shabbat service to Darfur that attracted about 80 people, Jewish and non-Jewish. Subsequently, executive members from UJA Federation of Hamilton attended an Eid-ul-Fitr dinner, marking the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan.

Another fruitful partnership brewed in Toronto when Epstein teamed up with Dr. Achol Dor, who moved to the Ontario capital from southern Sudan in 1995.

The two met three years ago at B'nai B'rith's black-Jewish dialogue group. Their discussions led to the creation of CASTS. The group now has more than 800 members across the country.

Epstein told the audience that Canada must act independently of the United Nations in Sudan and mobilize peacekeeping forces immediately. He said such moves by Canada could spur the international community to act.

He also implored the media to devote more coverage to the story.

"They brought the tsunami to our doorsteps, to our living rooms. Why not genocide? If we are quiet and complacent, we will be complicit in another genocide," Epstein said.

He also urged members of the Jewish community to write to their MPs and to Prime Minister Paul Martin, and to start petitions.

"After the Holocaust, the world said, 'If only we knew, we would have intervened.' Today, living in this global village, we have no excuse this time," he said.

"We continue to recycle 'Never again,' but we never act on it. The Jewish community, because of its legacy of genocide, should be at the forefront proclaiming to the world to do the right thing."

The Canadian and Israeli "constitutional" delegations meeting in the residence of Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker. [Peter Waiser photo]

Israel struggling for a constitution

Or, deputy head of the Israeli embassy in Ottawa.

To that end, the MKs, from all sides of Israel's political spectrum, spent two days in Ottawa meeting with Cotler, supreme court judges, academics and others to take a close look at what Israel can learn from Canada.

Israel has struggled with a constitution ever since its founding. "You can imagine the very serious obstacles it has to solve," said Gil-Or. "It was very important for [the MKs] to talk to Canadians."

Israel has 11 Basic Laws, enacted from 1958 to 2001, governing such areas as the Knesset, the judiciary, the status of Jerusalem, and human dignity. Together, these have served as a kind of mini-constitution.

The Israeli delegation consisted of the Knesset's constitution, law and justice committee, and was led by its chair, Michael Eitan of the Likud party. The itinerary was crowded but kept out of the public spotlight. "The media was not our first priority," Gil-Or said.

On May 2 and 3, the Israelis sat in on question period in the House of Commons; met with Commons deputy speaker Marcel Proulx; observed a session of the Commons' standing committee on justice, human rights, public safety and emergency preparedness; and held talks with four justices of Canada's supreme court: Louis LeBel, Morris Fish, Michael Bastarache and Rosalie Abella.

At the University of Ottawa, they attended a conference on constitutions in parliamentary democracies organized for them, and exchanged views with some of Canada's leading constitutional law scholars: Peter Hogg of Osgoode Hall Law School, Lorraine Weinrib and Ed Morgan of the University of Toronto, Joseph Magnet of the University of Ottawa, Daniel Turp of the University of Montreal, and Roger Tassé, who served as a key adviser to the federal government in the negotiations that led to the repatriation of Canada's constitution.

Also in attendance was Marc Gold, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee.

There was a later reception with Cotler and Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker.

In a statement, Israel's embassy said the MKs were interested in Canada because this country is "a model" when it comes to such similarities with Israel as democracy, multiculturalism, minority languages and the British common law heritage.

Issues explored by the Israeli parliamentarians included the importance of an entrenched bill of rights; the history of creating the Charter of Rights and Freedoms; the notwithstanding clause; relations between the three branches of government as prescribed by the charter; and judicial review, activism and the system of selecting judges.

The Israeli justice committee intends to submit its recommendations on drafting a constitution for Israel that will replace the current system of basic laws, the embassy added.

In addition to Eitan, the MKs who took part in the trip were: Eliezer Cohen (NUP), Yuli Edelstein (Likud), Rabbi Itzhak Levy (NRP), Yuli Tamir (Labor), Nomi Blumenthal (Likud), Michael Ratzon (Likud), Rabbi Nissim Zeev (Shas) and Eti Livni (Shinui).

Winnipeg students take part in trip to Washington

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Ethan Pollock says his visit to Washington, D.C., in mid-April was one of the most enjoyable experiences of his life, and the one that had the greatest impression on him.

The Grade 9 St. John's-Ravenscourt School student was part of a group of 114 Winnipeg high school students, Jewish and non-Jewish, who visited the American capital under the auspices of the Asper Foundation's human rights and Holocaust studies program.

The Grade 9 students and their chaperones took in the Smithsonian museum and other Washington sites. But the highlight, as always, was the Holocaust Memorial Museum.

"It was an excellent experience," Joseph Wolinsky High School student Eli Cristante told an audience on April 26, just prior to a Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra performance commemorating the anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. "The Holocaust museum is beyond the concept of a museum. It combines memory with a sense of peace. It causes you to reflect deeply on what went on. We were standing with visitors from Japan and Nigeria. I would encourage everyone to go."

"It was an amazingly powerful four days," says Rene Kaplan, a co-ordinator of the Winnipeg part of what has become a national program. "It's a life-changing experience."

Jeff Morry, the senior program manager for the Asper Foundation's human rights and Holocaust studies program, reports that this year's overall program is expected to have more than 800 participants in total from approximately 27 communities in nine provinces. There will be five separate trips to Washington. The next one, scheduled for May 15 to18, will have about 330 participants from 14 communities in eight provinces. During this trip, joining Congressman Tom Lantos in speaking to the students at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum will be Frank McKenna, Canada's ambassador to the United States.

Morry notes that more than one-quarter of participants in the program this year are non-Jewish.

"It is amazing how much support we are getting across the country," he says. "There is, for example, a teacher in St. John's, Nfld., who is bringing a group of 35 students on the May trip. It's the first group we have joining us from Newfoundland. And we are in negotiations with an Islamic school in Toronto."

Launched in 1997, the Asper Foundation program was conceived by the late Israel Asper. Its objectives are to promote tolerance and sensitize Canadian high school students to the consequences of racism through a specially designed education program. Initially, the Asper Foundation restricted the program to Grade 8 students at Winnipeg's Jewish Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, part of the Gray Academy.

It was then opened up to Jewish Grade 9 students in Winnipeg's public school system and then all Grade 9 students who showed an interest. The most recent group from Winnipeg included students from 15 high schools, including the Springs Christian Academy.

In 2000, for the first time, the program became a national initiative. It received the 2004 Human Rights Award from the Canadian Human Rights Commission. To date, over 4,500 students and chaperones of many faiths and backgrounds in 49 cities in nine provinces have participated.

Prior to the trip to Washington, all students are required to take an 18-hour education program – or its equivalent – on human rights and the Holocaust, with an added emphasis on American history and the civil rights movement. The curriculum for the educational component of the program was developed by Holocaust and human rights educators for the Asper Foundation.

After the trip to Washington, where the students also visit other monuments relating to freedom, the students are required to volunteer in their communities.

The last component of the program, Morry says, is an evening graduation ceremony held to present a Memorandum for Personal Responsibility to each student. The document was commissioned by the Asper Foundation for this program and written by Israel Asper.

The memorandum aims to provide the students with a sense of the importance of their participation in the program and to remind them that they have a personal responsibility for the world community.

"The ceremony is a wonderful way to provide the students with closure to the formal part of the program as well as the sense that they are now beginning a new life of greater understanding and tolerance," Morry says.

He adds that the value of the program is reflected in the support it receives across the country from private and public foundations, organizations and individuals. Another measure of the program's worth is the fact that in Washington, D.C., for several years, Congressman Tom Lantos, the only Holocaust survivor ever elected to the U.S. Congress, has met with and spoken to participants about the importance of understanding and protecting human rights.

Local Negev dinners raise funds for JNF projects

Held in Windsor, Hamilton and London

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Negev Dinners being held this month in Windsor, Hamilton and London, Ont., are raising money for a number of Jewish National Fund projects.

Proceeds from the Windsor dinner, to be held May 12 – Yom Ha'atzmaut – will go toward developing the Rock Park, located near the town of Kisra-Sumei in the western Upper Galilee.

Plans for the park, which has been created around a unique limestone formation, include developing a hiking path that will include comprehensive signage explaining the rock formations and their geological importance.

The park aims to attract Jewish, Druze and Arab Israelis, as well as tourists.

Honorees at the dinner, which is expect to attract about 600 people, are Rochelle and Bill Tepperman, owners of Tepperman's, a furniture store chain in southwestern Ontario.

Rochelle, a social worker, is, among other things, a co-founder of a breakfast program, chair of the Metropolitan Hospital Foundation, vice-chair of the Windsor Symphony Orchestra, past chair of the Windsor Police Services Board, and past chair of the Ontario Association of Police Services Boards.

Bill, the first federal candidate for the New Democratic Party in the area, in 1962, has been active in a number of areas, including as national board member of JNF Canada; president of JNF Canada's Windsor branch; board member of the Windsor Jewish Federation; fundraising co-chair for the Art Gallery of Windsor; and chair of the social planning division of United Way/Centraide of Windsor/Essex County.

He was named retailer of the year by the Ontario Furniture Manufacturers Association in 2003, and he was named entrepreneur of the year by the Windsor-Essex Chamber of Commerce.

Keynote speaker will be former Ontario premier Bob Rae. Dinner co-chairs are Noah, Andrew and Jonathan Tepperman.

In Hamilton on May 16, the Negev Dinner will pay tribute to Hamilton Holocaust survivors. The evening will feature a video and some of the community's survivors. Children and grandchildren of survivors will also take part in the program. About 800 guests are expected.

David Loewith, co-chair of the event with his wife Bonnie, said funds raised through the dinner will go to construction of a playground at Mitzpe Ramon, a town in the Negev.

"We thought this was a good tie-in with [the theme] of our dinner, because we are looking at future generations and Jewish continuity."

Guest speaker is Alan Dershowitz, Harvard University law professor and author, who will be speaking in Hamilton for the first time.

In London, dinner honorees Jan and Richard Lubell have selected the development of a family playground at Moshav Dovev, near the Lebanon border, as this year's project because of their commitment to improving the lives of children.

The playground features an area for children who are physically disabled, as well as pathways, picnic tables, a water fountain and a foundation for play equipment in a natural grove area.

Richard Lubell is a pediatrician and association professor at the University of Western Ontario, and Jan is a senior partner in a management consulting company doing strategic planning and program development.

In the mid 1970s, the Lubells were one of five families to co-found the London Jewish Family Association, which later became Temple Israel. They have taught Sunday school and conducted holiday celebrations, and continue to be active in the temple.

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Marjorie Baskin believed she had a responsibility to make her community a better place, and she acted on that belief in everything she did.

Baskin died April 26 of lung cancer. She was 77.

While many knew her as the wife of Bernard Baskin, rabbi emeritus at Temple Anshe Sholom (where he served as spiritual leader for 40 years), she was widely respected for her own accomplishments in health care, social planning and education.

Born in Denver, Colo., Marjorie moved to Hamilton with Rabbi Baskin when he came to the temple in 1949. Her involvement with the congregation included supervising its religious school, organizing its youth group and acting as hostess for numerous events.

"My wife was very much involved in the community," said Rabbi Baskin. "She worked at McMaster University for 21 years. She was chair of the Hamilton board of education. She was selected as the Negev Dinner honoree in 1984 for her outstanding work in the Jewish and general communities."

Marjorie Baskin

She started at McMaster as a research assistant in the department of metallurgy and also became a research associate in the department of epidemiology and biostatistics. Later, she worked as the community and public relations officer for the faculty of health sciences.

Baskin was elected to the Hamilton Board of Education in 1972 and was re-elected eight times, serving as chair in 1979.

She also served on the board of St. Peter's Geriatric Centre for eight years and was the first female president of the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton.

Rabbi Baskin said that co-founding the transit system for seniors and the disabled (known as DARTS) was one of her proudest achievements.

A wife, mother, volunteer and career woman long before it was fashionable, Baskin mentored other women and nominated them for public positions.

Mary Bloom Devor moved to Hamilton in 1962 and immediately became friends with Baskin.

"She was very interesting. She wanted to do good for the community," Bloom Devor said. "She was willing to engage in different activities. I enjoyed her company."

The two women met each week for lunch to discuss family, their children and world events. Bloom Devor remembers annual Victoria Day barbecues at the Baskins with all the kids in tow.

"We had a huge 75th party at the temple," Bloom Devor said.

Noting how Baskin believed in improving her world, Bloom Devor, a psychologist, said the two women would often joke about the good deeds they did.

"[Baskin's devotion to tikkun olam] started with her grandfather. We both came from families where we believed it was our responsibility to improve the community," Bloom Devor said. "Marjorie lived like that."

IDF, settlers formulate pullout 'code of conduct'

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Forces together with the leadership of the Gush Katif settlements are formulating a code of conduct ahead of the evacuation of settlements in the Gaza Strip, the IDF said Monday.

Col. Erez Katz, commander of the IDF's Southern Command training facility, said the IDF has carefully gone over the mistakes made during the evacuation of Yamit in Sinai in 1982 and several illegal outposts in the West Bank over the last few years.

According to Katz, one of the key lessons learned is the importance of maintaining an open line of communication with settler leadership during the evacuation. He added that the Gaza evacuation is one of the most complex tasks the IDF has ever faced.

"Senior officers will be present at the site of evacuation as it is carried out in order to defuse potentially volatile situations," Katz said. "The settlers are not the enemy, they are our brothers."

Col. Ofer Segal, head of the IDF infantry force training department, said soldiers have received detailed instructions about when they will be allowed to use force. According to Segal, troops and soldiers who will take part in the physical evacuation of settlers will arrive at settlements without any weapons.

The officer said the IDF is now formulating instructions on opening fire for the forces who will form the outer circles of the evacuation.

"Under no circumstances will soldiers open fire at an Israeli crowd, even if they are protesters breaking through IDF and police roadblocks in order to return to the Gaza Strip," Segal said.

He added that special forces will be kept on alert in case extremists using firearms will have to be neutralized during a blockade.

Tens of thousands of Israelis poured into the Gush Katif area of Gaza on April 27, during Chol Hamo'ed, to protest against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to dismantle the 21 Jewish communities in the Gaza Strip and 4 communities in the northern West Bank. The withdrawals are now expected to begin after Tisha b'Av. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Building Bridges Between Communities

14th March of Living brings together 18,000

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

OSWIECIM, Poland – Standing shoulder to shoulder and pressed in by history, 18,000 Jews from dozens of countries amassed on Yom Hashoah at the Birkenau death camp for the 14th March of the Living.

They listened as Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called on them to carry the torch of memory forward to honour the 1.5 million Jews murdered there by the Nazis.

"It will be incumbent upon you to tell of the Holocaust when there is no longer anyone around to provide first-hand testimony," Sharon said in a speech entirely in Hebrew at special ceremonies coinciding with the 60th anniversary of V-E day, the end of World War II in Europe.

"You – the link between the generation of the Holocaust and revival and future generations – have the duty to bequeath the lessons, memories and stories, to underscore the importance of the existence of the Jewish state."

As he spoke, the sun emerged for the first time that day.

The presence of Sharon underscored the importance of the occasion. With skies overcast and intermittent drizzle turning some of the ground slick, the crowd teemed beyond almost all expectations. There was a crush of bodies as security procedures obliged participants to enter Birkenau almost in single file. The crowd bottlenecked again at the ceremonies site, a huge field adjacent to the barracks.

A little after noon, more than 1,000 Canadians – aged 16 into their late 80s – began to make their way from Oswiecem train station, where they had arrived by train and bus, and to move progressively toward Birkenau from Auschwitz, a five-minute walk from the station.

Survivor Terry Guttman of Montreal said to The CJN: "Why am I here? Because in 61 years, I never said Kaddish."

Her voice breaking, Guttman said she was willing to be at the camp for the first time since 1944 because she felt it her duty to speak to young people who are now the same age as she was – 16 – when she was brought to Auschwitz.

The Canadians – many draped with large Israeli flags – walked six abreast in utter silence along Wyzwolenia Street and then on to Birkenau. Only minutes earlier, outside the train station, the young people had kibbitzed boisterously, snapping dozens of digital pictures of one another to remember the day by.

Before the ceremony began a couple of hours later, the mass of participants milled about among the camp's ruins of broken-down barracks and eroded crematoria, the lush greenery they walked on seeming to belie the camp's infamy. Others ate boxed kosher lunches and snacks or swapped hats as colourful national flags fluttered in the breeze.

Sixteen-year-old Emily Chaplin of Toronto, whose late grandmother had been a survivor, said she broke down visiting the gas chambers the previous day.

"It was very weird being there," she said.

Justice Minister Irwin Cotler and Bloc Quebecois MP Richard Marceau were originally scheduled to attend, but could not because of obligations in Ottawa (at writing, Cotler was to meet later with the Canadian MOL delegation in Warsaw). Among the Canadian municipal politicians at the event were city of Vaughan mayor Michael Di Biase and Vaughan city councillor Alan Shefman.

At the ceremonies, speakers included Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel, Polish Prime Minister Marek Belka, former Israeli chief rabbi, Israel Lau, and Abraham Hirchson, president of March of the Living International.

Wiesel referred to Birkenau as "the largest cemetery in history."

"It is here that evil minds shamed creation," he said. But he held out hope for mankind despite continued fanaticism, racism and anti-Semitism that are "a disgrace to whatever human nobility is."

Rabbi Lau questioned why humanity continues to do so little for the oppressed and for the millions around the world who continue to die at the hands of evil or neglect.

Hirchson called on Jews and non-Jews to preserve the memory of the Holocaust together. He said besides thinking of the six million "numbers of which the human mind can not comprehend… think about a different number.

"One. One Saraleh, one Moishele, who were killed at such a young age that they never had a chance to share with the world, their potentials for greatness or even to have any chance at life."

Belka praised initiatives to revive Jewish life in Poland and preserve the memory of the Holocaust there. He referred to the Nazi death camps in his country as names that "freeze the blood in our veins."

He described his daughter taking friends from western Europe to Auschwitz-Birkenau. "I remember he grief and sadness with which she talked to me about being there," he said. "Grief, sadness and meditation are with us today, when we bow our heads over the tragedy of the Shoah."

Michael Howard quits as leader of UK Tories

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — The Jewish leader of Britain's main opposition party said last week he would step down after losing a bid to become prime minister.

Conservative legislator Michael Howard made the announcement Friday, a day after British general elections, even though his party cut significantly into the margin of victory for Prime Minister Tony Blair's ruling Labour Party, which won an historic third straight majority.

Howard, 63, who has headed the Conservatives for the past 18 months, said it was time to allow a younger leader to come forward.

"At the time of the next election, in four or five years' time, I'll be 67 or 68, and I believe that's simply too old to lead a party into government," he said.

"So as I can't fight the next election as leader of our party, I believe it's better for me to stand aside sooner rather than later so that the party can choose someone who can."

Oona King lost the eastern London constituency of Bethnal Green and Bow, which has a large Muslim population, to former Labourite George Galloway.

Galloway, who ran as a candidate for his own anti-war Respect party, toppled King after attacking her support for the war in Iraq.

King, who is black and Jewish, had accused some Galloway supporters of anti-Semitism after an egg-throwing incident at a memorial to Jewish war dead during the campaign.

Bracing for withdrawal

Forty-four Israeli border towns are expected to be vulnerable to Palestinian attacks after this summer's Gaza Strip withdrawal. The Defence Ministry accorded the 44 towns and kibbutzim surrounding Gaza "confrontation-line" status, earmarking $48 million (US) for their protection. Security officials believe the communities will be in range of Palestinian rocket and mortar fire once Israeli forces leave Gaza. Yediot Achronot reported that Israeli defence firms were developing rocketproof roofs for residents. The communities also will receive armed patrols.

Israeli film hits Cannes

An Israeli film will be screened at the Cannes Film Festival this year. Amos Gitai's Free Zone is about Rebecca, an American who falls in love with an Israeli and gets caught up in a car deal that takes her to the West Bank and Jordan. The film created controversy when people criticized Natalie Portman for kissing a fellow actor during a scene shot at Jerusalem's Western Wall plaza. She apologized for the incident.

Palestinian protesters killed

Israeli troops killed two Palestinian rock-throwers during a protest against Israel's West Bank security barrier. Two army jeeps that entered Beit Lekia, a village slated for fence construction, came under attack by hundreds of locals May 4. Resorting to live fire after non-lethal riot control gear failed to restrain the mob, the troops killed two protesters, aged 14 and 15.

Report: Anti-Semitism rising

Anti-Semitic violence reached a 15-year high in 2004, an Israeli study found. The annual report of Tel Aviv University's Stephen Roth Institute, said a significant proportion of attacks on Jewish people and property in Europe and North America were perpetrated by marginalized Muslim immigrants, often in sympathy with the Palestinians. "Jews tend to be assaulted in countries where groups of young immigrants, mainly Muslims, but others too, are not well integrated and envy the perceived success of the Jews, such as in France, England and Canada," the report said. The study cited 501 violent anti-Semitic incidents in 2004, a six-fold increase since 1989, when the institute began its research. It praised the European Union for its crackdown on anti-Semitism and criticized Russia, Ukraine and Belarus.

Turkish leader defends visit

Turkey's prime minister defended his recent visit to Israel. Recep Tayyip Erdogan told his Islamist party that he came to Israel and the Palestinian territories "as a requirement of historical, national, humanitarian and regional obligations." Critics have accused Erdogan of visiting Israel to curry favour with the United States. Turkish-U.S. relations soured in 2003 after Turkey refused to participate in the Iraq war.

Germans herald V-E Day as liberation from Nazi tyranny

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BERLIN — Germany turned an important corner in its tortuous history last week as it marked the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II and its transition from Nazi dictatorship to western democracy.

In speeches by politicians at the Reichstag, the German parliament, V-E Day, May 8, was heralded as a moment of liberation from the Nazi yoke of tyranny rather than as a defeat.

Police kept neo-Nazis far from the Reichstag and the adjoining Memorial for the Murdered Jews of Europe, which was scheduled to be opened on May 10.

Germans who celebrated V-E Day also attended Days of Democracy, a 48-hour festival of rock concerts, exhibitions and candlelit vigils to extol Germany's embrace of freedom and democracy.

At the newly refurbished Reichstag, Horst Kohler, the president of Germany, declared that Germans look back at the 12-year Nazi period with "horror and shame" and will never forget the murder of six million Jews in the Holocaust.

Paying heartfelt tribute to the Allies for liberating his country, he said Germans are grateful for having been given a chance to redeem themselves.

Kohler, who addressed the Knesset when he visited Israel in January, noted that Germany has established good relations and ties of friendship with the Jewish state. "Who would have thought that possible in 1945?"

In a reference to Germany's "campaign of war and destruction," Kohler said he and like-minded Germans abhor and despise the crimes that brought disgrace upon Germany. Having emerged from the "moral ruins" of National Socialism, Germany has found itself again as a nation, he observed.

"Today we have good reason to be proud of our country."

He expressed trust that future generations will not allow such terrible crimes to be committed in Germany ever again.

Wolfgang Thierse, president of the Reichstag, said that Germany commemorates all victims of fascism, from Jews to Sinti (Gypsies), and remarked that its remembrance of the Nazi past is part of its national identity. "It's embedded in our collective culture and memory."

Germany has the right to remember the German victims of World War II, such as the civilians who were killed in bombing raids, he added. But grief over their deaths cannot atone for German guilt.

In a rebuke to Germans who identify with the Nazi epoch, Thierse said that racists and "dull-witted nationalists" can never again "hijack our democracy."

The most important results of the war, he concluded, are Germany's democratic constitution and its membership in the European Union, which "we must defend forever."

Several hours before Kohler and Thierse delivered their speeches, hundreds of neo-Nazis, mainly in their 20s and 30s, congregated at Alexanderplatz in eastern Berlin to rail against the Allied liberation of Germany and to describe V-E Day as a day of infamy and defeat.

Police in green uniforms kept them apart from leftist demonstrators shouting "Nazis out" and confined them to a small fenced-in area close to a major subway line.

In interviews with The CJN, a handful of neo-Nazis voiced nostalgia for the Third Reich, denounced the German government and complained about the restrictions that forbid them to express their opinions and display Nazi symbols and insignia in public.

The majority of the neo-Nazis, some dressed like hard-bitten bikers, refused to speak to a reporter. "Piss off," said one man with a pockmarked face and a ponytail. "We're not talking to the captive press."

At a festive anti-Nazi parade on Oranienburgerstrasse, the site of an old Jewish neighbourhood and a gold-domed synagogue that has been converted into an educational centre and museum, thousands of protesters marched to the beat of American big band music.

A few of the demonstrators, including Marius Weiss, a 25-year-old student, carried Israeli flags. Asked to explain, he said, "Because I'm German. I carry a great responsibility. Israel is confronted by a wave of anti-Semitism disguised as anti-Semitism. Israel must be strong and able to defend itself."

Fatah demands two new elections

By ARON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Fatah, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' party, is demanding that local Palestinian Authority elections be held again in Rafah and Beit Lahia in the Gaza Strip, which were won by Hamas.

Fatah officials accuse Hamas voters in those areas of voting several times by using identity cards of people who are deceased.

After the initial count last Thursday night both PA and Hamas leaders claimed victories.

Fatah said it won 55 per cent of the seats in the local councils. But although Fatah won more seats, these are in insignificant areas, while Hamas won in most of the larger towns in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Fatah candidates won decisive victories in 38 of the 82 municipal authorities where elections were held, for a total of about 230,000 people. Hamas won in 30 authorities whose population exceeds 600,000. Candidates not clearly identified with either organization and independent candidates won in 12 authorities, with some 70,000 residents. In fact Hamas now controls at least 48 local authorities in the territories.

Minyan turns Jerusalem–TA train into a rolling shul

By ELI STUTZ
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — A dedicated group of observant Israeli Jews has been sanctifying its cross-country morning commute by organizing a daily Shacharit minyan on the newly completed train line from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem via Beit Shemesh.

For many religious Jews, Shacharit, the morning prayer service, is ideally recited in the company of a minyan, a quorum of 10 Jewish men.

But juggling prayer in a minyan and a long commute is no simple business.

Shlomo Hubscher travels daily from Efrat to Tel Aviv. The last leg of his journey is a train ride from Beit Shemesh to Tel Aviv, a 38-minute trip.

Recently, he and a group of 15 to 20 fellow commuters have been making the most of that time by using it to pray together.

"We meet every day on the upper level of the last car, since that's the car which is closest to Jerusalem," Hubscher says.

Shacharit in a normal synagogue includes reading from the Torah on Mondays and Thursday. This element is so far lacking from the "train minyan." But the group hopes to procure a Torah as its members are now lobbying the municipality of Beit Shemesh to supply their minyan with a Torah scroll.

Alternatively, now that the line has been connected to Jerusalem, Hubscher hopes the Jerusalem municipality might provide one.

"The Jerusalem central bus station has a synagogue and Torah scroll, so we think it's not too much to ask for the city to facilitate the religious needs of daily commuters as well," he says.

"Praying on the train has changed my life," he says. "It's the most efficient way of spending my time. It's one less thing to do in a very busy morning, which includes a cross-country trip to work.

"It's also fun, and there's a certain camaraderie that's developed between the chevrah [social group]. In fact, recently one of us celebrated a siyum [a completion of a tractate of the Mishnah and/or Gemara], and he brought herring and Yerushalmi [Jerusalem style] kugel for everyone."

Hubscher says there are actually two separate minyans every day, one that starts at 6:55 a.m. and another that begins at 7:45 a.m. He alternates between the two, depending on when he leaves for work.

"There's enough room in the car for the minyan, and the other passengers have demonstrated remarkable understanding and co-operation. Every now and then a woman, standing in the back, will join us too."

There are ideas to expand to a third minyan at 8:45 a.m., as six or seven of the regulars often catch the train at that time.

Hubscher says there's also often a minyan for Minchah (the afternoon prayer service) on the way home.

While there's a halachic debate about the feasibility and desirability of praying while in transit, Hubscher insists there are sufficient rabbinical authorities who contend that it's permissible.

Part of the opposition to praying in motion stems from the likelihood that a travelling worshipper will not be able to focus properly.

Hubscher admits that's a bit of a challenge, but he says it's surmountable.

"As far as concentration is concerned, you get used to it after awhile. People generally hold on to something as they are praying."

The "train minyan" is searching for a name. Suggestions the members are mulling over include "Beit Knesset Tfillat Haderech" (the Wayfarers Prayer Synagogue), "Choo Choo Shul," "Shul on Wheels" and "Mesilat Yesharim" (the Right Track).

As for the future, now that the line has been connected to Jerusalem, Hubscher is debating what to do with the 25-minute stretch between Jerusalem and Beit Shemesh.

One idea he is toying with is to start Pesukei Dezimrah (the first section of the morning prayer) with the Jerusalemites and then move on to Barchu (which starts the main section of the morning prayer) once the group from Beit Shemesh boards, allowing for a more leisurely paced service.

But he's confident that, with a second line under construction between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem via Ben-Gurion Airport and Modi'in, the future of rolling minyans is right on track.

To find out more about the "train minyan," contact Hubscher at +972-52-6006804 or shubscher@deloitte.co.il.

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — A Pentagon aide was arrested on suspicion of passing classified information to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

Larry Franklin turned himself in to the FBI last Wednesday, the U.S. Attorney's Office told JTA, and will answer charges that he passed information to two senior staffers from the lobby group during a June 2003 lunch in Virginia.

The staffers – AIPAC's policy director, Steve Rosen, and Iran specialist Keith Weissman – were fired last month. AIPAC declined immediate comment on Franklin's arrest. According to the federal complaint, the information Franklin allegedly passed was classified top-secret and related to potential attacks on U.S. forces in Iraq.

The complaint goes on to say Franklin told the AIPAC staffers, who aren't named in the complaint, that the information was "highly classified" and asked them not to use it.

The criminal charge sheet was the first official accounting of a case that first made headlines last August, when FBI agents raided AIPAC's Washington headquarters and confiscated files belonging to Rosen and Weissman.

While the June 2003 lunch appears to be the linchpin of the criminal charges, there are other allegations, including that Franklin leaked classified information to journalists and to an unidentified "foreign official," and that he kept 30 years' worth of classified information on his computer at home.

Reports have suggested that Franklin also met with an Israeli Embassy official. The reference to a "foreign official" might point in that direction.

But the FBI has not contacted the Israeli Embassy, representatives say, and Israeli officials continue to maintain they would never take part in illicit information gathering in the United States.

Jewish Americans created the U.S. comic book industry

Men of Tomorrow by Gerard Jones, HarperCollins.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The comic book, featuring action heroes from Superman and Batman to Jimmy Olsen and Captain America, is a uniquely American art form.

Transcending class, religion and ethnicity, comics hold millions of adolescents and adults in thrall to a parallel reality drenched in fantasy where good always triumphs over evil.

Gerard Jones

The writers, illustrators and publishers who created and nurtured this immensely profitable and influential industry in the United States were largely Jews from immigrant and working-class backgrounds whose cast of steely characters still capture the imagination of North American readers.

In Men of Tomorrow, Gerard Jones, an insider in the business, offers a rigorous and entertaining examination of comic book history, culture and lore.

Comics, as he explains, were basically an extension of the world of pulp magazines and adventure movies and spoke to the anxieties of modern life.

What had been "a small corner of the junk culture industry" in the late 1930s had morphed into "the greatest single unifying element of American childhood" by the early 1940s.

Readers lapped up Superman and Captain Marvel and a plethora of new titles such as Flash, Hit, Crack and Zip. But, as Jones notes, comics aroused the contempt of many Americans as a byword for "cultural stupidity" and even depravity.

Still, comics thrived, and the war years were the wonder years of the industry. Superman sold more than two million copies an issue, while Captain Marvel was close behind.

He estimates that, by 1942, more than one-third of the printed matter mailed to U.S. military bases consisted of comic books.

Toward the close of the 1940s, some 40 publishers, based in Manhattan, were churning out 300 titles generating sales of 50 million comics a month.

According to one study, more than half the readers were 20 or older, reading an average of 11 comics per month.

Tastes changed as a new genre of humour, western, romance, crime and horror comics more or less supplanted the superhero comic.

Under the impact of television and paperbacks, the business slumped in the mid-1950s, but eventually bounced back.

Jones devotes chapter and verse to the now-legendary figures whose genius transformed comics – notably Harry Donenfeld, Jerry Siegel, Joe Shuster and Jake Kurtzberg (otherwise known as Jack Kirby).

The son of Romanian immigrants, Donenfeld was an ambitious, driven individual who drifted into the industry after his clothing store went bankrupt. Suddenly under pressure to make a living, he took a job as a salesman in his brother's printing company.

A talented hustler, he landed a lucrative contract to print six million subscription inserts for mass-circulation Hearst magazines such as Cosmopolitan and Good Housekeeping.

But Donenfeld's greatest claim to fame was as publisher of Superman, the stupendously successful comic created by Siegel and Shuster, who were friends.

As Jones relates, Siegel was an indifferent student and tended to be shy. However, he was a fervent aficionado of comic strips and an aspiring comic book artist. Shuster, born in Toronto, was a quiet, gentle boy who had similar interests and aspirations.

They collaborated on comic strips about crime fighters and interplanetary adventurers. Newspaper syndicates rejected their work, but they soldiered on, until their breakthrough with Superman.

Though hardly a new idea as a concept, Superman was an instant sensation when it made its debut in 1938. Being unschooled in these matters, Siegel and Shuster signed a release surrendering all rights to the publisher, Action Comics. They would deeply regret their act of folly and, in the ensuing decades, attempt to redress it through lawsuits.

Superman spawned a series of animated cartoons and licensing agreements for toys, costumes, puzzles, watches and cereal, all masterminded by Donenfeld and his similarly astute partner, Jack Liebowitz.

Adolf Hitler denounced Superman as a Jew and banned sales of the comic in Germany. In Italy, Benito Mussolini followed suit.

These idiotic edicts had no real effect on the solvency of the U.S. franchise. But by the mid-1940s, Superman sales had, for other reasons, dipped temporarily by 20 per cent.

Victor Fox – a British Jew who arrived in the United States at the end of World War I and whom Jones describes as a disreputable character – was instrumental in the creation of Wonder Man. He was a golden-haired muscleman in red tights who had a yellow "W" emblazoned on his chest.

Bill Finger dreamed up Batman, but the illustrator Bob Kane breathed life into him. For dramatic effect, Kane drew his hero in silhouette and placed him against a full moon.

Kirby, whose father had emigrated from Austria, had little formal training as a draftsman. But his piece de resistance – Captain America smashing through legions of jackbooted fascists and belting Hitler in the jaw – was a great hit. Within two issues, Captain America was selling a million copies a month, and Kirby was an overnight icon.

Yet comics did not appeal to all Americans, as Jones points out.

In 1948, long after Captain America had vanquished the bad guys, a psychiatrist named Fredric Wertham, who had studied the factors that lead children to violence, accused comic books of being a pernicious influence on youth. He levelled his accusation in an interview in the mass-circulation magazine Collier's.

The public response stunned the powers-that-be in the comic book industry and prompted the media to address the issue.

Newspapers warned of the dangers of comics, while Newsweek pointedly asked, "Are comic books a national hazard?" Time magazine, meanwhile, quoted Detroit's police commissioner as claiming that comics were "loaded with communist teachings, sex and racial discrimination."

Still worse was yet to come. Churches organized boycotts of retailers who carried comics and citizens' groups demanded action from police and lawmakers.

Scrambling to avert financial ruin, comic book publishers fired off press releases boasting of their in-house codes of decency and formed the Association of Comic Magazine Publishers, modelled on the Motion Picture Production Association.

These ploys worked, and the industry never looked back.

More than 65 years after Superman's initial appearance, comic book heroes from Batman to Wonder Woman are still around, flying though movie theatres, television screens, video games and toy stores.

"They may be more popular and culturally relevant now than when they were new," observes Jones in this trenchant book that celebrates "this oddest of American art forms."

A peak into Israel's Zionist community

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival ends on May 15. Here are previews of four of the final movies.

* * *

Joseph Cedar's sensitive and compelling Campfire is one of those rare Israeli movies that offers a peek into the religious Zionist community in Israel.

Mainly set in Jerusalem, a year before Israel's 1982 withdrawal from the Sinai Peninsula, it's about a youngish widow trying to find meaning in life and keeping her two coltish daughters under parental control.

Rachel Gerlick (Michaela Echet), an observant woman whose husband recently succumbed to cancer, has decided to live on a settlement in the West Bank. She believes a new environment will help her and her teenaged daughters, Esti and Tami, adjust to the new situation.

Esti (Maya Maron), a rebellious girl who blames Rachel for her father's death, is less than enthusiastic about leaving the comfort of her familiar surroundings in Jerusalem.

Rachel believes in "the cause," and as she tells a committee studying her application, she has long dreamed of living on a settlement. The committee members take her sincerity and dedication at face value. But what they are really looking for are couples, not single women.

In an attempt to help her, Motke (Assi Dayan), the chair of the committee, encourages his gossipy wife to find a suitable mate for Rachel. The first candidate, Yossi, is a kind, simple bus driver and confirmed bachelor.

Not impressed with Yossi (Moshe Ivgy), Rachel agrees to date a self-absorbed, globe-trotting cantor. But he, too, falls short of her expectations.

Eventually, Rachel, who has never been in love before, learns to appreciate Yossi's qualities. In the meantime, Tami is sexually abused. The incident forces Rachel to re-examine her goals.

Campfire, which elicits excellent performances from its cast, is the work of a young and accomplished filmmaker with a bright future.

A wealthy German businessman, his elegant wife and entourage are in Budapest to celebrate his 80th birthday at Szabo, a famous Hungarian restaurant. The man was posted to Nazi-occupied Hungary in 1944 and 1945 as an SS officer.

As he gazes upon the photograph of a beautiful, dark-haired woman, he stands up, clutches his chest and drops dead.

The film flashes back to Budapest in 1941. Ilona, a sultry waitress, is the object of desire of three attractive men: Szabo, the charming Jewish owner of the restaurant; Aradi, the talented house pianist; and Wieck, a pragmatic German entrepreneur.

As their respective romantic liaisons and yearnings play out or fizzle, Aradi composes a sweet, melancholy tune. An international hit, it bizarrely prompts some of its fans to commit suicide.

Gloomy Sunday fast forwards to 1944. Wieck, all decked out in a fancy uniform, appears in Budapest. He and his superior, an officer modelled on Adolf Eichmann, dine at Szabo's restaurant. Wieck is friendly, but his colleague is deeply anti-Semitic.

Ilona, having met Wieck again, warns Szabo that the Nazis intend to murder the Jews of Hungary. Szabo receives a document from Wieck excluding him from deportations. But who knows what the future holds?

It turns out that Wieck, while not necessarily anti-Jewish, is a supremely calculating and cynical operator who believes he can benefit financially from the climate of rampant anti-Semitism.

* * *

King of the Corner, an American film based on the book Bad Jews and Other Stories by Gerald Shapiro, is a low-key comedy directed by and starring the character actor Peter Riegert.

Riegert portrays Leo Spivak, a harried middle manager at a New York advertising company who is coping with an ailing but demanding father in an Arizona nursing home.

Sol (Eli Wallach), the father, is tired of life and asks his son to make his funeral arrangements. Sol, though, is still on the ball. He warns Leo that a young, ambitious employee he is supervising back in Manhattan covets his job.

The film can be amusing. A scene in which Leo and the mercenary funeral director negotiate a contract is, if you can excuse the pun, dead on.

The plot thickens when Leo's wife (Isabella Rossellini, in a limp performance) berates him for not being strict enough with their daughter.

Then, in a wasted vignette that really adds little or nothing to the proceedings, Leo has a fling with an old high school flame (Beverly D'Angelo) during a business trip down south.

Eric Bogosian shines as a freelance rabbi hired to officiate at Sol's funeral, as does Riegert when he delivers a spontaneous eulogy.

King of the Corner is hardly a first-rate film, but it has its moments.

* * *

An Arab man of few words and his family live in a backwater on confiscated land somewhere in Israel. They are charcoal makers, and Abu Wael conveys their hard-scrabble life with a minimum of strokes.

His wife wants to leave. His son, against his wishes, hopes to continue his studies. His daughters are sullen, maybe because the man has had an incestuous relationship with one of them.

This is doubtless a dysfunctional family.

Director/ actor Vladimir Mashkov

Papa

Papa, the emotion-laden film that closes this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, has been noted as the first major Russian film with a shtetl Jew for a hero. Its director is Vladimir Mashkov, one of Russia's leading actors, who also plays the title role as Abraham Schwartz, a struggling merchant in the Ukrainian village of Tulchin.

Adapted from a stage play by Aleksandr Galich, the film has only three time settings – Tulchin in 1929, Moscow in 1939 and northern Russia during wartime – as opposed to Galich's four; Mashkov omitted a final episode that he believed appeared in the original as a result of Stalinist pressure. The result is a simplified cinematic triptych that, although well made, carries none of the complexity we have come to expect from Russian storytellers such as Dostoevsky, Chekhov and Pasternak. It's a short story, not a novel.

Similarly, Schwartz is nothing like the Jews in the shtetl fiction of Sholem Aleichem and I.L. Peretz, though his depravity seems a little reminiscent of I.B. Singer. Schwartz drinks, collects postcards of faraway places and dabbles in illicit business deals; he also beats his young son, David, a gifted violinist whose eye is on the train that leads out of town.

Ten years later, in the movie's middle section, David has risen to his promise as a violinist and is being feted as a musical prodigy in Moscow, having left the shtetl far behind him. Then his crude, dishevelled Papa barges in, embarrassing him in front of his friends and party superiors. Withstanding his son's angry curses, the old man blesses him, leaves him a pile of money and departs.

The third section opens on a Russian hospital train five years later. David, injured in battle, is about to have his arm amputated. Then his father's ghost pays him a visit, recounting how the Nazis deported all the Jews of Tulchin to their deaths; the tragedy is retold in ghetto flashbacks that seem hauntingly surreal. As the son begs forgiveness from his paternal phantom, the soundtrack rises to a sentimental violin crescendo, suggesting, as closing credits flash, that David's magical arm might be spared.

Like many 19th-century European tales that featured romanticized vignettes of ghetto Jews, this darkly imagined allegory of shtetl life and its dissolution seems to adhere to some externalized vision of who the Jews might have been: it makes no reference to Torah or synagogue.

While there's much of genuine interest in this well-crafted film, its cardboard idea of a Jew is its weakest element. Speakers of Russian may find the Muscovite accents in the shtetl also somewhat incredible. Still, Papa's cinematic imagery is intriguing and its conclusion packs an emotionally jarring punch. Bloor Cinema, May 15, 9:30 p.m.

Another Side of Peace

Making its Canadian premiere at the festival, Another Side of Peace is an hour-long Israeli documentary that focuses on the Parents Circle, a joint Israeli and Palestinian support group for bereaved families who have lost children in the conflict.

Although the organization would like to grow smaller, there's no shortage of traumatically victimized families from both Israeli and Palestinian societies who view their participation in the group as a way of living their belief that it's time to end the bitter enmity and coexist peacefully as neighbours.

Roni Hershenzon, a 60-year-old Israeli, lost one son to a homicide bomber and a second son to depression and suicide after the latter's best friend was also taken by a homicide bomber. He says his life is about getting out of bed and surviving each day, yet he's driven to help others cope with an anguish parallel to his own, in part because he realizes that his daughters and grandchildren still need and rely on him.

Hershenzon's Palestinian counterpart, Ghazi Brigrieth, seems equally motivated to share his grief with other bereaved parents in Israel and the West Bank, hoping the bridges built between the two societies will help to lessen the violence between them.

Fortunately, director Ellen Frick does not let her ideological bent intrude too deeply into the film, saving it from becoming just another preachy documentary. Instead, she plays off our natural compassion and sympathy for these bravely bereaved beings, whose response to personal calamity may inspire as much admiration from others as it does comfort for themselves. Bloor Cinema, May 15, 5 p.m.

Epic about the Crusades riveting but not first class

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ridley Scott's epic, Kingdom of Heaven, which opened in theatres in Toronto on May 6, turns on an awesome, historic clash of civilizations.

This period piece, which resounds to the echoes of his previous film, Gladiator, is set between the second and third Crusades in the 12th century.

It is infused with political overtones and with the sound and fury of battle as Christian and Muslim armies fight ferociously for the heart and soul of Jerusalem.

In essence, Kingdom of Heaven is about the hatred that stirs some believers and about the consistent absence of peace in the Holy Land, from the Crusades to the present day.

The $110 million (US) picture, shot in Spain and Morocco (a stand-in for Palestine), adopts an even-handed approach to the bitter medieval conflict, which pitted the forces of Christendom against Islam.

Balian, the central character in this rousing movie, observes in a rare reflective moment that no one has a carved-in-concrete claim to Jerusalem, where a better world – a veritable kingdom of heaven on earth – can be fashioned.

Jews are mentioned only in passing in Kingdom of Heaven, which unfolds almost a century after Christian crusaders slaughtered Jews and Arabs in Jerusalem.

Balian (Orlando Bloom), the solemn blacksmith-turned-knight, is deep in mourning when he is first glimpsed in France in 1184. Still heartbroken by his wife's suicide and the loss of his child, Balian compounds his problems by killing a sneering priest.

Balian's father, Godfrey of Ibelin (Liam Neeson), a wise nobleman who has been a Crusader, advises him to go to Jerusalem. There, in the city of forgiveness, he can erase his sins and begin anew.

As Balian proceeds to Jerusalem, he discovers that his fellow pilgrims are animated by dark impulses. In a reference to Muslims, a pilgrim declares that if he kills an infidel, he will be catapulted to the path to heaven.

Far from being ethnocentric and bloodthirsty, Godfrey supports the idea of amity between Christians and Jews. This can be interpreted as a plea for tolerance in a world riven by religious triumphalism.

Like Gladiator, whose sheer arresting drama it usually cannot match, Kingdom of Heaven is awash in violence. The thunder of horses, the clanging of swords and the splatter of blood and gore fill the screen. And it is riveting stuff.

Balian's voyage to Palestine, which is fraught with uncertainty and danger, is dispensed with in an all too brief scene during which his flimsy ship capsizes in stormy waters. His trip across desert sands to Palestine is punctuated by a deadly duel with an overconfident Arab warrior.

Jerusalem is portrayed as a city of minarets and churches, thick crowds, teeming outdoor markets and braying donkeys.

Christian extremists want to break the uneasy truce with Saladin, the Arab general who exudes caution and wisdom. Christian moderates, such as the leprosy-ravaged king and his adviser, Tiberias (Jeremy Irons), hope to preserve the tenuous ceasefire.

When the king dies and his sister, Sibylla (Eva Green), marries one of the Christian radicals, after having had a love affair with Balian, the die is cast for a renewal of warfare. "Give me a war," bellows her short-sighted husband, Guy de Lusignan (Marton Csokas).

Scott depicts these immoderate Christians as aggressors. He also impugns the basic motivations of the Crusaders. As Tiberias puts it, "We weren't fighting for god, but for land and wealth."

Saladin's siege of Jerusalem, filled with fire and dust and death, is spectacular. Yet Kingdom of Heaven, lacking depth and overdosed on testosterone, falls short of being a first-class epic.

Still, it may enthrall many viewers.

Pint-sized fundraiser is a tzedakah veteran

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Young Amanda Belzowski has a very impressive record as a fundraiser. To date the seven-year-old has raised $15,000 for the Becel Heart and Stroke Ride for Heart.

Every year the Grade 2 student at United Synagogue Day School sells lemonade on behalf on the Heart and Stroke Foundation. Last year she raised $6,300.

The little lemonade stand she set up on her bubbie and zaidie's lawn in 1999 is now an annual event that has grown in scope to include an auction, button making, pony rides, jumping castle. and live entertainment. Dan the Music Man will perform at noon and balloon artist Kenton Kruger will also be on hand for the festivities.

This Sunday, on May 15, Amanda will be running her lemonade stand from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. on the front lawn of her grandparents Lou and Betsy Fruitman's home at 10 Brian Cliff Dr., in the Lawrence Avenue and Leslie Street area, just across from Edwards Gardens. There are tax receipts for donations of $15 or more.

"We have signs with lots of balloons," says Amanda's mom, Lisa Belzowski. "People say you can see the balloons from far and wide. Just turn west on Lawrence at Leslie and drive three blocks. You can't miss it."

"We were driving by a lemonade stand and then my dad asked me if I would like to sell lemonade, too. I said, 'Yes.' We just finished the bicycle ride for the Heart and Stroke Foundation and we thought it would be a good idea to raise money for them."

Amanda says she enjoys raising money for the Heart and Stroke Foundation because it's such a worthy cause, and she notes that there are people in her family with heart conditions who may potentially benefit from her efforts. "My bubbie and my great-grandfather have artificial valves in their hearts. They think what I'm doing is great."

The event is also very enjoyable, she adds. "It's fun to see my friends and some of my teachers also come. I like the riding ponies."

Amanda has garnered a lot of media attention over the years. Aside form The Canadian Jewish News, her story has been covered in the Toronto Sun and the Toronto Star, and she has been featured on CFRB, Global Television, CFTO and City TV.

She has also been getting support from U.S. business mogul Donald Trump. Last year she invited him to attend the event, she says. "He wrote a letter saying he couldn't come because he was filming The Apprentice. He told me to 'Keep up the great work.'"

In this year's letter, she says, Trump thanked her. He said he expected her to continue and that he was very proud of her.

Her fundraising efforts in 2004 were aided by Shirley and Barry Jones of PPL Legal Care in Trenton, Ont. She says Barry Jones called to say he would match whatever money she raised. The lemonade stand and all the related events brought in $3,300.

She later ended up with Barry Jones on the Becel Heart and Stroke Ride for Heart podium after the community bicycle ride last June to present a large cardboard cheque for the money she raised.

"It was really fun," Amanda recounts. "I held up this really big, big cheque for $6,300."

Amanda's mother Lisa says there is an important value to be learned from this fundraiser: that you can give back to the community in different ways.

"Amanda says, 'You're never too little. You can have lots of fun and help other people at the same time.'"

Corporate sponsors of the event include World Star Entertainment, Party Warehouse Outlet, Lionel's Pony Rides, Fedex Kinko's, Dominion (which provides the lemonade and food) and Aquareal (which lends water cooler dispensers for the lemonade), Simonwong.com, the designer of Amanda's website and Black's Photography.

Charity fashion show to benefit ICRF

C3: Come Cure Cancer, which showcases Toronto's young Jewish community modelling and dancing, takes place on May 16 at 7:30 p.m at the Moonlight Ballroom in Toronto.

The event is organized by a group of Montreal-born 20-somethings who live in Toronto. They hope to raise awareness as well as funds for ICRF.

This is the first year that the Next Generation division will hold what will become an annual ICRF charity fashion show in Toronto. Previously, it was held in Montreal. Last year's show raised about $30,000 for the cause.

"There are very few opportunities for young people in Toronto to get involved in their community. There are even fewer opportunities for them to contribute to specific, serious causes such as cancer research," said Jen Weisz, C3 executive committee member.

"Young people may not have the capacity to make big financial contributions to important causes, but they do have the talent, the energy and the will to produce a show that will generate funds and awareness for ICRF."

For more information about the fashion show, contact Janna Zittrer, 416-977-8225, or ICRF executive director Joy Wagner, 416-487-5246.

Jewish Food: The World at Table

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

I've got a bone to pick with Matthew Goodman, the Food Maven columnist at the Forward, the renowned 105-year-old Jewish newspaper. His new cookbook, Jewish Food: The World at Table, contains so many fascinating essays on the history of nearly extinct Jewish communities and their cuisines that I spent so much time reading I almost missed my deadline!

Did you know the mother of King Ferdinand of Spain was a Converso, that Yemenites were the only people on earth who used Hebrew for communication before it became the official language of Israel, and that the earliest borscht was made not from beets but from parsnips?

More than 170 recipes, some of which have never before been written down, document the rich and varied Jewish culture of 29 countries linked by law and ritual, yet distinguished by unique customs, traditions and celebrations, the history of a people told through its food.

Goodman used his reporting skills to search out diverse cuisines of far-flung, once-vital centres of Jewish life. "What I tried to do with this book was to locate and preserve food traditions from communities around the world that are today endangered because the communities themselves are endangered," Goodman said from his home in Brooklyn, N.Y. "So many of them weren't able to survive the 20th century or survived only in the most attenuated form."

Take, for example, the Tunisian Jewish community, which most people don't even realize existed, he said. "The site of the El-Ghriba synagogue goes back, I believe, to the fifth century BCE. In 2002, it was the target of an Al-Qaeda attack and was blown up. As of 1948, there were 100,000 Jews in Tunisia. Today there are fewer than 2,000."

Baghdad and Tripoli, Bombay and Calcutta – once vital Jewish communities – are extinct or practically so, he continued.

"In Salonika in Greece, the markets used to be closed on Saturday for the Sabbath. Today there are 1,500 Jews left. From 32 synagogues to two. Their food is a history lesson on a plate."

But what is Jewish food? Can it even be defined?

"There are very few dishes that are shared by all Jewish communities around the world," noted Goodman. "Only two or three, and only one shared ingredient, matzah. You couldn't define a cuisine based entirely on matzah. Jewish food is food that has been made by Jewish communities through the centuries and sustained by them, wherever they happened to be."

Nestled between the recipes are essays on selected ingredients, dishes and communities, deepening our understanding of their historical context. "Food is kind of a repository of a community's history," Goodman observed. "You can see the wanderings of people over time, the influence of conquest, of poverty, of travel."

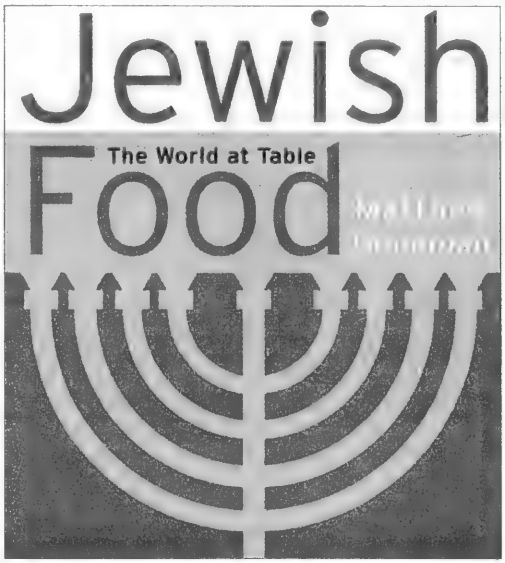
As an example, he cites the use of pine nuts and raisins in Roman Jewish cooking, as in baccalà, salt cod stewed in tomato sauce. "Pine nuts and raisins were brought by the Arabs to Sicily, where the Jews learned how to use them," he said. "Then when they got kicked out of Sicily during the Spanish Inquisition, they brought them when they moved up to Rome. Today, the use of pine nuts and raisins in both sweet and savoury foods is one of the hallmarks of Roman Jewish cuisine. You can see the history of these people in this dish."

The closest thing to biblical era cuisine anywhere, said Goodman, is the food of the Yemenites. "The Jews of Yemen tended to live in isolated rural villages, not in big cosmopolitan areas," he explained. "As a result, their cuisine remained fairly static over the centuries. There wasn't a lot of technological development or interaction of ingredients with people coming in from other places, so you have today almost a vestige of a cuisine that goes back 2,000 years. The bread called salouf made in Yemen today might well be recognizable to a Jew of 2,000 years ago."

Salouf is served with z'houg, a very spicy green chili paste, which Yemenites use on practically everything, he added. "It's a wonderfully fascinating and healthy cuisine that people don't know much about. There are maybe only about 10,000 people of Yemenite descent left, most of them in New York and New Jersey."

Sadly, some recipes are irretrievable, Goodman said. "There are so few of these dishes left. It's really like an extinct species.

"So many generous people shared their recipes with me. Some would invite me to their home and let me cook with them. It was just an amazingly moving experience for me. But with each recipe they'd give me, they'd say, 'I wish you could have tried these other two that so-and-so used to do, but she died.' That dish is gone forever."



BACCALA IN UMIDO ALLA ROMANA
Italian salt cod stewed in tomato sauce with raisins and pine nuts

2 lbs. dried salt cod
2 tbsp. olive oil, plus more for frying
1 onion, sliced
1 28-oz. can chopped tomatoes
2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil
½ tsp. ground cinnamon salt
freshly ground black pepper
flour for dredging
½ cup raisins
¼ cup pine nuts

Soak the salt cod in cold water for 36 to 48 hours, changing the water at least 3 times per day. Drain the cod, pat dry and remove any bones. Cut the cod into 2-in. pieces and set aside.

Heat the 2 tbsp. oil in a large skillet over medium heat. Add the onion and cook, stirring often, until soft and lightly coloured. Add the tomatoes, basil and cinnamon, and season with salt and pepper. Simmer over low heat for 15 minutes.

Spread some flour on a plate and season it with salt and pepper. Dip the cod pieces in the flour on both sides to coat evenly, shaking off any excess.

In another large pan, add oil to a depth of about ¼ inch and heat over medium-high heat. In batches, add the cod pieces to the pan and fry until golden brown on both sides, about 3 minutes on each side. Remove with a slotted spoon and drain on paper towels.

Add the cod to the simmering tomato sauce, along with the raisins and pine nuts. Cover and simmer over medium-low heat until the cod is tender and cooked through, 15 to 20 minutes. (Add a bit of water if the sauce seems too thick.) Taste the sauce and adjust for seasoning. Transfer the fish to a large serving platter and pour the sauce over it. Serve hot. Serves 6.

SALOUF
Yemenite flat bread

2 cups warm water
1 package (about 2½ tsp.) active dry yeast
1 tsp. sugar
1½ cups unbleached all-purpose flour, plus additional for kneading and rolling
1 tsp. salt

Put the warm water in a large bowl. Add the yeast and sugar and let stand until the mixture begins to bubble, about 5 minutes. Slowly add the flour and salt and stir until fully incorporated.

Turn the dough out onto a lightly floured surface and knead until it is smooth and elastic but still moist and slightly sticky, about 10 minutes, adding flour as necessary to keep the dough from sticking. Place the dough in a large, oiled bowl, turning once to coat. Cover with a towel and let rise in a warm place until nearly doubled in volume, about 1 hour.

When the dough has risen, punch it down, cover again, and let it rise for another 30 minutes.

Spread some flour on a large plate. Slice the dough into quarters. Roll each quarter into a ball, and roll the balls in the flour until they are lightly covered. Let them rest on the plate, covered with a towel, for 20 minutes.

On a lightly floured surface, stretch each dough ball into a round about 10 inches in diameter. Place 2 rounds on each of the prepared baking sheets and bake until golden brown, 15 to 20 minutes. Serve warm or at room temperature. Makes 4 loaves.

Z'HOUG
Yemenite green chili paste

This fiery-hot paste is essential to Yemenite cuisine and is added as a flavouring to stews or served as an accompaniment with fish and meats or with the many varieties of Yemenite bread.

1 cup fresh cilantro or flat-leaf parsley leaves
3 tsp. cumin seeds
4 tsp. black peppercorns
1 tsp. caraway seeds
8 cloves
8 cardamom pods
1 tsp. salt
8 garlic cloves
3 tbsp. olive oil

Combine all of the ingredients in a blender or food processor and process to a rough paste. Transfer to a tightly closed jar and refrigerate until ready to use. It will keep in the refrigerator for several weeks. Makes about 2 cups.

U of T conference still a go despite Israel boycott

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

The University of Toronto says it will not cancel a psychiatry conference to be co-hosted by British academics who are members of a group that boycotted two Israeli universities last month.

In a statement posted on U of T's website, vice-president and provost Vivek Goel said that while he does not agree with the boycott by Britain's Association of University Teachers (AUT), cancelling the May 27-28 conference, to be co-hosted by the University of Manchester's psychiatry department, would be hypocritical.

"We do not agree with the boycott action by the British academics," Goel said. "Furthermore, the university does not agree that as a result we should cancel this important academic event or bar our Manchester co-hosts from participating – that would be another blow to academic freedom. Two wrongs don't make a right."

In an interview, Goel said that although U of T has received many calls from people in the Jewish community urging that the conference be cancelled, the school will not do so.

The AUT boycotted Bar-Ilan and Haifa universities for allegedly supporting Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza and for repressing academic freedom.

Bar-Ilan was targeted due to its support of the College of Judea and Samaria in the West Bank town of Ariel, and Haifa was boycotted because the university allegedly victimized "academic staff and students who seek to research and discuss the history of the founding of the State of Israel."

Goel said the U of T conference, which will address issues about trauma and global health, has nothing to do with the issues raised by the AUT three weeks ago and that all academics, including Israeli ones, are welcome to attend.

He also emphasized this is not an AUT conference, and that the Manchester professors just happen to be part of the union. (The six participating Manchester academics have reportedly gone on record as saying they do not support the boycott.)

"It's less than a handful of British academics that made that boycott. It makes no sense for us to cancel [the conference]," Goel said.

Ed Morgan, a U of T law professor and the president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, is encouraging Dr. Donald Wasylenki, the chair of U of T's psychiatry department and the conference's organizer, to invite professors from Haifa and Bar-Ilan to participate.

Wasylenki, who did not return calls by The CJN's deadline, told the Toronto Star there would be no reason to invite professors from Haifa or Bar-Ilan because neither institution has a medical school, but Morgan said Israeli professors should still be invited as a gesture.

"I'll be encouraging [the organizers] to look for Israeli professors in the related fields. We want to show them that we embrace academic freedom and boycotts are contrary to that. We should be open to exchange ideas, not block them," he said.

While Morgan is upset by the AUT's boycott, he said that a "counter-boycott" would not help.

"My suggestion was not to engage in counter-boycotts [by banning British professors,] but to make sure that Israelis can participate in the conference."

Morgan believes the AUT boycott has more to do with anti-Semitism than a protest to Israeli governmental policy.

"It is an opposition to the very existence of a Jewish state, and I do equate that kind of anti-Zionism with anti-Semitism," Morgan said.

"The best case scenario," he said, "is that professors from Haifa and Bar-Ilan will participate in the conference."

Meanwhile, the AUT has decided to call a special meeting to reconsider its boycott in the wake of letters of protest from members requesting the decision be reversed and after several members resigned in protest. A meeting date had not been set as of last week.

Academic gathering to study parallels between Shoah and Nanjing Massacre

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — An academic conference in China this summer will examine the parallels between the Holocaust and the Nanjing Massacre.

Called the International Seminar on Holocaust and Genocide in World War II: Jewish and Chinese Experiences, the event is scheduled to take place in August at Nanjing University.

Some 300,000 Chinese civilians were murdered by the Japanese army in Nanjing in 1937 and 1938. According to Robert Daum, a University of British Columbia professor of classical, near eastern and religious studies who visited Nanjing in 2004, the massacre is remembered by most Chinese as a key event in their country's history.

The conference is being sponsored jointly by the Center for Jewish Studies at Nanjing University and the London Jewish Cultural Centre. It will include participants from Yad Vashem, the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, the Anne Frank House in Amsterdam and the Centre de Documentation Juive Contemporaine in France.

The meeting will feature lectures, seminars and museum tours. Lectures will include "Rescue and Resistance during the Holocaust and Rescue Efforts during the Nanjing Massacre"; "Massacre and Remembrance" and "The Holocaust and Memory: Nanjing and Japanese Deniers and Holocaust Denial"; and "Teaching the Holocaust and Teaching the Nanjing Massacre in Schools."

Daum said he is impressed by the strong interest in Jewish studies in China and by the solid research on the subject there in the last 15 years.

"It might seem unusual for Chinese scholars to be interested in the activities of a small Jewish community so long ago," Daum says. "I'm only speculating, but both Judaism and China are ancient civilizations, and it is possible that the Chinese are naturally drawn to another ancient civilization."

Jewish studies is a growing discipline in China, due largely to the efforts of Nanjing University's Xu Xin, who has lectured all over the world on Judaism in China. His work has paved the way for researchers in at least nine Chinese universities and institutes.

It is thought that Jews settled in China in the early Middle Ages, arriving in Kaifeng in the central province of Henan more than 1,000 years ago.

Jews settled along, and traded up and down, the Silk Road, which stretched from China to the eastern coast of the Mediterranean.

The Kaifeng Jews built a congregation in the late 12th century. Scholars believe they trained their own rabbis and had siddurs and Torah scrolls to conduct services, which they performed until the 19th century, when the last rabbi died.

Last October, Xu organized the largest conference on Jewish studies ever held in China. The event, which took place in Nanjing, attracted some 75 scholars from around the world. Among the participants were Daum and Morton Weinfeld, a McGill University professor of sociology.

The conference covered a broad range of subjects, including biblical literature, post-biblical rabbinic literature, modern Hebrew literature, Jewish cultures around the world, Jewish life in China in the Middle Ages and in the 19th and 20th centuries, and Jewish studies in China.

Jewish and Chinese civilizations have much in common, Daum says, including the importance of tradition, memory, education, family and longevity and the measurement of time in millennia.

After the October conference, Xu led the group on a tour of historic sites, including the site of the Nanjing Massacre.

"That visit was not on the original itinerary," Daum said. "Prof. Morton Weinfeld, the only other Canadian scholar at the conference, requested the itinerary change on behalf of all of us.

"We insisted on paying our respects to the victims of the Nanjing Massacre, as well as to learn what we could about this terrible event. I wonder whether our detour played a role in shaping the conference [on the Holocaust and the Nanjing Massacre]?"

The Shoah: Rock 'n' Roll never forgets

By SCOTT R. BENARDE
Special to The CJN

When remembering and teaching the Holocaust, we often forget the power of the popular song. For decades, rock, pop, folk and rap songs have served as gripping reminders of the Shoah, but have been overshadowed by literature and film.

Folk icon Woody Guthrie wrote about the Holocaust as early as 1948 when he penned Ilsa Koch, about the sadistic wife of the commandant of Buchenwald. The opening couplet immediately sets the hopeless scene: "I'm here in Buchenwald. My number's on my skin."

The Klezmatics pulled the recently unearthed song into the 21st century by adding music, turning the as yet unrecorded Ilsa Koch into a fearful dirge in concert. (The song is to be included on a Klezmatics CD called Holy Ground set for release in 2006.)

A whole album worthy of mention, though it's difficult to find and more a blend of jazz and opera, is David Axelrod's Requiem: The Holocaust, released by Liberty Records in 1993. Axelrod, a noted jazz producer and composer who also worked with the '60s rock act Electric Prunes, was compelled to write and produce the record in response to watching white supremacist Tom Metzger deny the Holocaust during a TV broadcast.

One of the earliest Holocaust references on record occurs in Bob Dylan's classic With God on Our Side from 1964's The Times They Are A-Changin'. "When the Second World War/ Came to en end/We forgave the Germans/ and we were friends/ Though they murdered six million/ In the ovens they fried/ The Germans now too/ Have God on their side."

These Holocaust-themed songs also are available on CD:

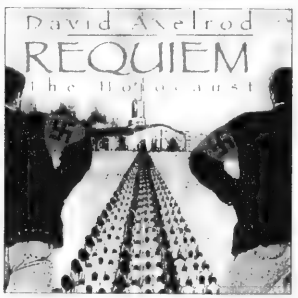
Red Sector A by Rush: Perhaps the most well-known of Holocaust-influenced rock songs as it first appeared on the band's hit 1984 album Grace Under Pressure, and has been a staple of the band's live shows ever since. The seeds for this harrowing rocker were planted 60 years ago in April of 1945 when British soldiers liberated the Nazi concentration camp Bergen-Belsen. Rush lead singer Geddy Lee's mother Manya (now Mary) Rubenstein, was among the survivors. "I once asked my mother her first thoughts upon being liberated," Lee says. "She didn't believe [liberation] was possible. She didn't believe that if there was a society outside the camp how they could allow this to exist…"

Rush's lyricist Neil Pert came up with lines such as: "Are we the last ones left alive? Are we the only human beings to survive?"

"The whole album," Lee says, "is about being on the brink and having the courage and strength to survive."

This Train Revised by the Indigo Girls (From 1994's Swamp Ophelia): Set to blazing fiddles and volcanic drums, the song steams along like an out-of-control engine spitting smoke-and-fire images: "It's a fish-white-belly, lump-in-the-throat, razor-on-the-wire, skin-and-bone, piss-and-blood in a railroad car, 100 people—gypsies, queers and David's star, this train is bound for glory…"

The Door by Martin Page (From 1995's In the House of Stone and Light): The non-Jewish Page did not set out to write a Holocaust-inspired song for the album. He had a piece of music he describes as "uplifting, dark and mysterious," and he kept singing the phrase "the door," to a certain part of the melody. After he finished making a demo recording of the tune in his home studio, he glanced up at a bookshelf, saw Treblinka by Jean-Francois Steiner, grabbed it and read it.



"I was so moved," Page says. "I grew up in England, so I was very aware of the Holocaust, but I was not aware of the bravery at Treblinka…I instantly went back into studio and the song, in a way, wrote itself."

Never Again by Remedy (From the 1998 compilation The Swarm: Wu Tang Presents the Killa Bees): Frustrated that public schools weren't teaching the Holocaust, the Jewish Staten Island rapper, (born Ross Filler), composed his own history lesson. Combining ancient Jewish prayers, hip-hop rhythms, an ominous melody and quaking lyrics resulted in the most complete and defiant portrait of the Holocaust painted in song: "Never again—shall we march like sheep to the slaughter. Never again-shall we sit and take orders. Stripped of our culture, robbed of our name, Raped of our freedom and thrown into the flames. Forced from our families, taken from our homes. Pulled from our God and burned of our bones. Never Again!" (Also available on Remedy's 2001 and 2002 solo releases The Genuine Article and Code: Red.)

Tattoo by Janis Ian (From the 1993 album Breaking Silence): Ian was 10 when she first learned about the Holocaust from books in her parents' home library. As an adult, she tried for years to write a song addressing the calamity. The poignant, almost-whispered Tattoo, which reminds us that survivors never completely heal, is the result: "Her new name was tattooed to her wrist. It was longer than the old one. Sealed in the silence with a fist. This night will be a cold one."

Ride 'em Jewboy by Kinky Friedman and the Texas Jewboys (From 1973's Sold American): Perhaps the most misunderstood pro-Jewish Jewish musician around, Friedman's choice of band name and song titles offended many Jews and gave a chuckle to many bigots. Ride 'em Jewboy was a sentimental tribute to those who perished in the Holocaust: "Dead limbs play with ring-less fingers. A melody which burns you deep inside. Oh, how the song becomes the singers. May peace be ever with you as you ride."

Lithuania by Dan Bern and the International Jewish Banking Conspiracy (From 2002's The Swastika EP): Bern lost grandparents, aunts and uncles when the Nazis invaded Lithuania in 1941and wiped out the Jewish population. Hitler and the Holocaust are a recurring theme in Bern's music, but nothing is as cathartic as Lithuania. Long and angry, it includes this passage: "I sometimes want to dance on Hitler's grave and shout out 'Groucho Marx, Lenny Bruce, Leonard Cohen, Philip Roth, Bob Dylan, Albert Einstein, Woody Allen, Abby Hoffman, Leonard Bernstein, Harry Houdini, Sandy Koufax!' And then I want to scream and sing as loud as I can, to the chandeliers that sway dangerously overhead, and proclaim Krystalnacht is over!"

Attic by Jill Sobule (From the 1997 album Happy Town): The Denver-born singer-songwriter conjures up the ghost of Anne Frank when she asks in a wistful, almost naïve tone "Would you have hidden me in your attic, that's the question I'd like to know." The acoustic tune poses a most powerful question between its pretty melody and Sobule's delicate, almost fragile singing. Sobule, who is Jewish, says she feels compelled to put songs about WWII on her albums.

Untitled by Peter Himmelman (From 1992's Flown this Acid World): Also known as The Taxi Song, Himmelman based this quiet yet potent tale on his own experience of riding in a taxi with a bigoted, anti-Semitic cabbie who doesn't realize his passenger is Jewish. During conversation, the driver speaks of his admiration for Hitler saying, "Hitler's only fault was that he had to go and lose." The song ends with Himmelman visiting a survivor:" I spent the next morning with a man who had death camp numbers on his arm/ And I swore to myself I would do anything to protect him from further harm/ and he told me 'Wherever you may go/ You must refute them if they say it wasn't so.'"

Winnipeg businessman named to curling hall of famers

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Zivan Saper has never been much more than a casual curler, yet the well-known Winnipeg businessman was recently inducted into the Manitoba Curling Hall of Fame.

Saper made the hall as a builder alongside curlers Elaine Jones, Iris Armstrong, Gary Ross and E.J. Rochon, plus the Vic Peters rink of 1992-93.

As far as the "roaring game" is concerned, Saper was never the skip you called upon to draw to the button in the game's final end to take home all the spoils.

Zivan Saper

Yet, in his own quiet way, he humbly climbed to curling's top rung and was added to the hall of fame's executive honour roll in recognition of his service to the sport as president of the Canadian Curling Association (CCA) in 2000-01.

Prior to that, Saper served as president of the Manitoba Curling Association (MCA), was a tireless volunteer for the Maple Leaf Curling club, where he was secretary treasurer for 25 years, and was the man credited with bringing the 2003 World Curling Championships to Winnipeg.

"I did not play the game competitively," he confirmed in an interview. "I'm a recreational curler. I used to go to the odd bonspiel, but I'm more of a grassroots person. I was just interested in promoting the game."

Saper, who is in the insurance business, never set out to make his mark in the world of curling. It just happened and he was as surprised as anyone when he learned the MCA was beckoning him into its hall of fame.

"In all the years I was involved, I never ever dreamt about it," he said. "I always thought that I had received the biggest payback from the gratitude."

As a young man, back in 1963, he curled with the juniors at the storied Maple Leaf Curling Club in Winnipeg's north end. "Here is another oddity," said Saper. "I recall how Barry Greenberg used to come in on the train from Portage La Prairie to curl with us on the same team and he is now the president of the CCA. Also on that same team was Ian Staniloff, who is today the executive director of the MCA."

Ever the promoter, Saper reminded me that "Manitoba is the curling capital of the world. We have two major dailies and when there is anything going on we have wall-to-wall coverage."

There was a time not that long ago that Manitoba curling veterans felt that the game was going to fade in the province unless the younger set became involved in the sport. Today, Saper doesn't completely share such a gloomy outlook. "I think it's returning because it's back in the high schools," he said.

He tempered his enthusiasm somewhat by adding, "I think the problem now is that there are so many other distractions. When I started curling, there was nothing else to do. Job responsibilities and family commitments are different. At one time I curled three times a week, now just once."

Saper's curling roots run deep, thanks to his late father Max's passion for the sport. Max Saper passed away at age 78 during the March 1998 Brier being held in Winnipeg.

"I learned from my dad that whenever anyone asks the Sapers to help with curling, you don't say no to people. Dad taught me that. It was important to him and he made it important to me," he said.

Saper also credits wife Tannis and son Avi for their understanding over the years. "If you don't have a supportive wife and child," he said, "how else are you going to be involved in curling like I am?"

Saper, as it turns out, still has much promotional work to do for the sport he loves. "Now I'm involved as a consultant for the Men's World Curling Championships to be held in Lowell, Mass., at the Tsongai Arena in April of 2006. I have friends in this game," he said, "not only from coast to coast, but all over the world."

MACCABI TEL AVIV TRIUMPHS: A victory celebration took place in Tel Aviv after the Maccabi Tel Aviv basketball team beat the Spanish team, Tau Vitoria, 90-78, in the European basketball final in Moscow last Friday. This was the second year in a row that Maccabi Tel Aviv won the Euroleague basketball final and the fifth time the team has won the European championship. After the game, the centre of Tel Aviv became a sea of excited fans waving scarves and placards emblazoned with the team's yellow colours and the Israeli national flag. At one point, the police had to block off the city core to traffic because of the celebration. [Isranet photo]

Schechter Showdown

An all-star team from United Synagogue Day School, comprising players from the Bathurst, Bayview and Richmond Hill campuses, participated in a spring tournament in Cleveland against Conservative-stream Solomon Schechter schools from Chicago, Detroit and Pittsburgh. In addition to playing in the tournament, the boys enjoyed a Friday evening service and dinner followed by a student-run service the next morning. The team managed to defeat their Ohio hosts by 18 points.

We walk alone

Many years ago, someone ruthlessly told me that we are born into this world alone and we leave this world alone. Overwhelming sadness swept through my body and soul at the realization this was possible. Today, the harshness of what these words mean haunts me because I believe they are true.

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

Loneliness is a universal phenomenon and it visits every human being at some time in every culture all around the world regardless of race, class, age or sex. For different people it means different things. For some it may be a feeling and for others a condition. It is the paradox of human existence to attempt to fill the loneliness void. However, our search, our desire, and our need to surround ourselves with people we can share our lives with can go on forever.

There are lonely people all around us. Last week, I saw my friend sitting in the rain alone with his dog. He very recently left a life of homelessness and moved into his own apartment. When I asked him what he was doing back on the street he said, "I don't want to go to my place and just stare at the walls alone. I would rather sit out here."

That night, instead of going home to my own empty apartment, I sat with him. We watched people rush along the busy downtown Toronto streets and I wondered how many of them experience loneliness.

How many elderly people do you know who feel alone? I used to visit a woman in her 90s named Mable. She never got married and had no children. The loneliness she felt as she sat in her hospital bed at Mount Sinai must have been devastating. But you don't have to be homeless or elderly to feel the silence of living in an innocuous world that regrettably does not always offer peace of mind.

However, I attempt to find solace in the lyrics of a song by Green Day called Boulevard of Broken Dreams. I am also comforted by the popularity of it – if others also listen to it, they must be feeling the same way. Right?

Green Day sings, "I walk a lonely road, the only one that I have ever known. Don't know where it goes, but it's home to me and I walk alone. I walk this empty street on the Boulevard of Broken Dreams. Where the city sleeps and I'm the only one and I walk alone.

"My shadow's the only one that walks beside me. My shallow heart's the only thing that's beating. Sometimes I wish someone out there will find me. Till then I walk alone."

The lingering effect of the lyrics resonates with me in my empty moments. As thoughts rush to invade my subconscious, I try not to hide from the truth and reality of the world – that ultimately we are fundamentally separated from each other and that it's OK to feel this way. Because when you really think about it, no matter how many people love you and how close you are with your partner, friends and family, at the end of the day there is always a part of us that is alone. No matter how much love and compassion you feel for another person, there is still a boundary. You cannot change the fact that you are you and I am me and you can never fully experience someone else's thoughts and feelings.

We may be on the same planet in the same universe as each other but eventually we all walk alone.

I read that when the Temple was destroyed and torn away from the Jews, they saw themselves as no longer connected and sat shivah. During that time they felt the expression of existential loneliness and said, "Aicha yashva badad" (How lonely it is to sit alone).

GREEN BEANS WITH SESAME VINAIGRETTE

1 1/2 lb. green beans, trimmed
3 tblsps. olive oil
1 tsp. Asian sesame oil
1 tblsp. white-wine vinegar
2 tsps. Dijon mustard
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. black pepper
2 tblsps. sesame seeds, toasted

Cook beans in a large pot of boiling salted water, uncovered, until crisp-tender, 4 to 5 minutes. Drain in a colander and immediately transfer to a bowl of ice and cold water to stop cooking. When beans are cool, drain and pat dry.

Whisk together oils, vinegar, mustard, salt and pepper in a large bowl until combined well, then add beans and sesame seeds and toss to coat. Yield: makes 6 servings.

We need more than continuity

Seymour Epstein

We are just completing the week of new Jewish holidays that fall between Pesach and Shavuot. The week starts with the tragedy of the Shoah, commemorated in the calendar on the 27th of Nisan as Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah. A week later, we find ourselves remembering yet another great loss, the many soldiers killed in Israel's wars since 1948. The sadness of that day, Yom Hazikaron, is broken by the joy of the following day, Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's Independence Day.

The ongoing curricular problem for Jewish educators is the same problem that our sages had in trying to eternalize the first Pesach in Egypt for future generations. Their solution was the seder, and, indeed, that wondrous piece of educational theatre has worked for us wherever we have lived and in all periods of Jewish history.

We are still very close to the events commemorated in this week of new Jewish dates, but I notice that my students think of the Six Day War as ancient history, while my memories of June 1967 are quite vivid. Will we find the proper ceremonies and lesson plans to re-create the terror and the loss of the Shoah, the fragility of our new state in times of war and the loss of so many young, brave souls, and the national joy of the sovereign return to our homeland?

Many attempts have been made over the past decades by individuals and by movements in the Zionist camp, but no single instrument has emerged that resonates with Jews in the way that the Pesach seder has both engaged us and galvanized us as a people.

This is the main reason that I have such disdain for the term "Jewish continuity." Jewish education has always been about Jewish creativity. Jewish teachers work diligently in their classrooms, youth groups and camps in the hope that a few of their students will use their genius to create the Jewish future through that rare mix of a deep foundation in our past and an innovative concern for the next era of Jewish life. Continuity is not enough!

How I met Mr. Gorgeous and Interesting

By MINDY LAMPERT

He sat down next to me and told me he was a lawyer. Or was it a financial adviser? Or an accountant? All I can remember is that after the eighth guy told me he was a lawyer, I suddenly became very interested in his shoes.

I'm only 23 years old and I'm already too busy to find time to date. Between school and a full-time job, I barely even have time for online dating. So when my friend told me about a Jewish speed dating event in Toronto, I was excited.

Having never heard of speed dating before, I had several questions that I wanted answered. What if I don't like any of the guys? What if they don't like me? What if I saw someone I know there (and I knew the chances were good)?

But the idea that in one night I could go on dates with 28 different Jewish guys intrigued me. So my two girlfriends and I arrived at the designated venue just in time to go to our assigned seats. I was station "D," and luckily my friend was right beside me at "C." The room was set up so that each of the 28 female participants had her own station. Every three minutes, a bell would ring to indicate a date was over and that it was time for the men to rotate clockwise to the next station. We kept a scorecard for each date and put a checkmark beside the names of the guys we liked.

My first date was great. The guy was gorgeous and very interesting. We talked about how we attended the same university and had, ironically, lived in the same student house just four months apart from each other. The second date, however, was a disaster. It was with a guy I had dated very briefly a month earlier and with whom I had abruptly ended things. That three-minute date seemed to last for three hours!

As the night went on, I met other interesting guys and I met some not-so-interesting ones. One poor guy even used the line, "You'd be crazy not to want to date me… I mean look at me." I felt like saying, "Oh yeah, have you ever cheated on your girlfriend or forgotten her birthday?" But instead, I just nodded and smiled and pretended to be interested in what he was saying.

After 28 dates, I was tired. It was time to go home and reflect on my evening and see which guys I would hear from. There were only two guys that I was really interested in seeing again. The first guy was date number 1, Mr. Gorgeous and Interesting. The second guy was a non-lawyer with whom I felt a connection.

One of the great perks of speed dating is that you don't get stuck with people e-mailing or calling you if you don't indicate that you're interested in them. Within three days of the event, each of the participants received an e-mail with a list of the people who also checked our names off – in other words, our mutual matches. Luckily, both of my guys had also checked off my name. So we now had each other's e-mail addresses.

For someone who is too busy to date, I suddenly found myself with two guys – whom I had already had a first date with – e-mailing me and inviting me out for a second date.

Two weeks after the event, I met up with guy number 2 at a bar and discovered that I was wrong to think there was any connection between us. The following week, I met up with Mr. Gorgeous and Interesting. We had a wonderful first date, which led to a second date, and we are making plans for a third. We still laugh about how we were each other's first date of the evening, and how we were stuck sitting through 27 more dates after we met each other.

Mindy Lampert is still single and living in Toronto.

Dear Reader,

Throughout history, Jews have always yearned to live in Eretz Yisrael. Jews who lived in the Diaspora often invested much time & effort in order to reach the shores of Eretz Yisrael. This never-ending lure, underscores Am Yisroel's unbroken bonds to the Holy Land & their Avos. Today, most of us have friends and family who have chosen to live inthe Holy Land and nearly everyone has visited or spent some time in the country. Almost all of us have dreamt at one time or another- of owning property in Eretz Yisrael.

The dream of owning or investing in real estate property in Eretz Yisrael continues to lure a wide array of foreign investors, including a sizeable portion from the U.S. and Canada. In order to provide our readers with the most up-to-date information on real estate opportunities in Eretz Yisrael, we embarked on creating a multi-dimensional Israel Real Estate Supplement and Exhibition.

We believe that the vital information contained in this supplement, will go a long way towards helping make your real estate dream become a beautiful reality.
B'hatzlach!

Israel's Real Estate Market Continues To Ride A Wave of Unique Opportunities

By Ken Solomon

While "true peace" between Israel & its hostile neighbors may still be years away, the new realities in the region, namely the demise of Yasser Arafat & the democratization of the Arab world, have had a direct impact on the Israeli economy- especially in the real estate market. During the past year, as the number of terrorist incidents against the Jewish population dropped precipitously, the local economy began to show sustained growth. Consumer confidence returned, as did the number of investors from overseas. In fact, even as you are reading this, Israel's Tel Aviv Stock Exchange is riding a wave of record-breaking performances.

The domino effect of increased tourism to the Jewish State from the UK, USA, Canada, & France, as well as a spike in European anti-Semitism has also re-energized Israel's real estate sector. Many foreign visitors from the USA, Canada & other countries are coming to Israel with initiatives to purchase apartments or homes, thinking short-term (staying for the Yom Tovim & summertime vacation) or long-term (potential aliyah, part-time residency, investment). Thus, prices that were rock-bottom less than 18 months ago, have recently jumped by at least 20% or more.

The most active areas within Israel's bustling real estate market are found in towns & cities where there are sizeable English-speaking communities (mostly in Central Israel or Jerusalem) or specifically designated neighborhoods that are being built in order to attract new Orthodox families. These areas include Jerusalem, Ramat Beit Shemesh, Netanya, & Modiin/ Modiin Illit. All of these communities boast sizeable and active Anglo populations.

Jerusalem

Many people don't realize that Jerusalem is Israel's largest city, with nearly 600,000 residents in the metropolitan area.

Jerusalem's real estate market is extremely diverse & competitive. Prices in and around the city continue to rise. In recent months, city planners have given the green-light to several builders, who have started to construct high-quality apartment complexes in the Romema neighborhood at the entrance to the city. The dearth of new "inner city" real estate projects, has led to a spike in prices of individual flats & homes throughout the area. Because Jerusalem boasts many different types of religious neighborhoods (Litvishe, Chassidic, Sephardic, National Religious etc.) and standards of building, it is best to consult with a competent local real estate expert.

There are however, exciting new real estate projects that are in various stages of development in some of the city's newer neighborhoods and Northern suburbs. Some of these projects feature incredible panoramic views of the region, or are located close to Judaism's most holy sites.

Suffice to say, that Jerusalem offers a quality of life that is second to none, spiritually (shuls, mikvaot, yeshivot) as well as fiscally (shopping, cultural activities etc.). Almost any investment in the Holy City is bound to pay fiscal and spiritual dividends. And, as we went to press, Israel Railways inaugurated its new Jerusalem- Beit Shemesh - Tel Aviv line (opposite the Malha Mall), which will certainly ease traffic congestion and provide businessmen with a scenic alternative to driving between the Jewish State's two largest cities.

Ramat Beit Shemesh

Located about 20 minutes from Jerusalem, Ramat Beit Shemesh was specifically designed as an Orthodox satellite community just outside of Beit Shemesh proper. Beit Shemesh itself was once a sleepy town in the rolling hills & valleys near where a young Jewish warrior named David slew the Phillistine giant Goliath (nearby Elah Valley). During the past 15 years, Beit Shemesh has emerged from being a backwater immigrant town, into a city with a diverse population. Ramat Beit Shemesh became a real estate challenge for many private and commercial building companies. The results have been astounding, as the hills have literally come alive with a wide variety of new apartment complexes and private cottages. Remember, Ramat Beit Shemesh is a frum community, so like Jerusalem, there are many different types of neighborhoods catering to different religious preferences. There are plenty of shuls, mikvaot, yeshivot, kollelim etc. Ramat Beit Shemesh also boasts a mélange of social & health services as well as a wonderful variety of new Mehadrin supermarkets. Downtown Beit Shemesh (just 3 minutes away by car) also features a beautiful new train station, which whisks many business people to and from the Tel Aviv area throughout the day in about 25 minutes. Many English-speaking immigrants from N. America & the UK have purchased flats and cottages in the area during the past few years.

Netanya

This rapidly growing coastal city is in the midst of a construction boom. Netanya, which is located about 25 minutes north of Tel Aviv is also home to one of Israel's veteran Anglo communities. While Netanya is a "mixed" city of religious and secular Jews, there are several neighborhoods that are by and large Orthodox with a variety of shuls to choose from. Due to its proximity to the sea, Netanya has unlimited real estate & tourist potential. Netanya is also renowned for its diverse shopping opportunities (including the country's only IKEA branch). Netanya also has a growing hotel & tourist industry that has pumped millions of dollars into the local economy. It is a "hot-spot" for many Canadian, French & British Jewish vacationers.

over 100,000 people live in the area and it continues to grow at an astounding pace. Statistically speaking, it is perhaps the hottest real estate market in the country.

Modiin Illit/Modiin is strategically located only 25 minutes from both Jerusalem & Tel Aviv (also only 15 minutes from Ben-Gurion Airport). The area also boasts a diverse population and a high quality of life, with lots of "green belts". Modiin Illit emerged as part of Kiryat Sefer, a quiet Torah community that outgrew its original boundaries. When the town of Kiryat Sefer became a city, the name was officially changed to Modiin Illit. There were real estate considerations involved in the name change as well. Some of Israel's best-known real estate companies began building bigger and better apartment complexes and shopping areas, appealing to middle and upper class ultra-Orthodox families.

At the present time, three new entire neighborhoods are under construction in Modiin Illit. In addition, the adjacent "East Mattityahu" area of Modiin Illit is about to be transformed into a major real estate development for the Torah community. It is predicted that within five years, Modiin Illit will triple its current population from 40,000 to 120,000 residents. Real estate prices in Modiin Illit are currently cheaper than Ramat Beit Shemesh or Jerusalem but it won't stay that way for long.

The nearby city of Modiin, is the fastest growing "mixed" metropolis in all of Israel. At the present time, over 20 real estate companies are building all over Modiin, with the ultimate goal of creating a city of over 125,000 people (60,000 live within the city limits already) within five to seven years. Modiin, despite its historical & religious significance (recent archeological findings include shuls & mikvaot from the Second Temple/ Hasmonean area), was originally not conceived as a city with a religious future. However, a wave of religious immigrants from N. America, UK, Uruguay, South Africa & France as well as an influx of religious Israelis looking for a change of lifestyle, has transformed the composition of the city. While still very much a "mixed" city, Modiin now boasts close to 35 minyanim! There are also many different types of yeshivot in and around Modiin. It is truly a "city of the future", as Modiin is on the verge of being linked to the national rail system (by mid- 2006, you'll be able to take "the train to the plane" i.e. Ben-Gurion Airport from midtown Modiin, as well as Tel Aviv). A major shopping mall & business district that will serve the entire region is also currently under construction. Real estate prices have risen by nearly 20% in Modiin's fast-growing Buchman neighborhood during the past six months. It is expected that they will rise even higher in the coming year, as the city's infrastructure projects (train, new roads, shopping centers & parks) are completed.

Kinneret Region

Because Israel is still growing by leaps & bounds, the government has encouraged builders to erect projects in towns & cities that may not be as well known as Jerusalem or Tel Aviv, but are nevertheless attractive investments for a variety of reasons. Examples include Ashdod & Tzefat (Safed). Ashdod, a beautiful coastal city of over 200,000 people (located about 20 miles south of Tel Aviv) has become a magnet for many European Jews, who have purchased magnificent seaside/marina apartments that are in various stages of construction. The city also features an expanding Orthodox population. Community leaders are working with construction companies to increase the number of real estate opportunities in the area. A new train link to the city from Tel Aviv has also made Ashdod a lucrative place to live.

Up North, the beautiful & mystical Galilean town of Tzefat has quietly seen an expansion of one-of-a-kind real estate developments. The Israeli government is planning a major push to populate with the Galilee-Kinnerret region within the next few years, making any real estate venture an attractive investment.

Project Guide

Pearl Skolnik Reaslty

Pearl Skolnik has worked as a real estate agent for 25 years in Jerusalem and for nearly 10 years in Ramat Beit Shemesh. Two years ago, she opened a new office in Modiin, which is growing at a rapid pace.

All the real estate agents in her offices, are veteran Anglo immigrants who understand the needs of Western olim and strive to find just the right community for each family. They are very aware of the importance of securing the right home and neighbors for their clients, knowing that this is a critical part of a successful integration into their chosen communities and Israel.

Pearl Skolnik Realty offers a wide selection of services including: investment projects throughout Israel, both income-producing and in pre-building stages; homes for sale/rent in Ramat Beit Shemesh, Beit Shemesh, Modiin, Yad Binyamin, TelzStone, and Jerusalem, as well as absentee owners' management services of property in these areas. They also offer services in several senior citizen housing complexes throughout Israel.

In addition to a wide array of "second-hand" homes, Pearl Skolnik Realty also represents several enticing real estate projects, which have the potential for excellent investments. In some cases, the value of a residence can go up 20% upon completion, and sometimes even as much as 50%, depending on location and type of residence. They are very careful to work with reputable developers, so that their clients will be in trustworthy hands!

Some of the more interesting projects Pearl Skolnik Realty is representing include: Yad Binyamin, a marvelous community now expanding, which is only half an hour from everywhere; Ramat Neriya and Ahuzat Shimshon townhouses/homes in Beit Shemesh, along with two popular townhouse projects in an area most in demand within Ramat Beit Shemesh. In addition, they are currently working on the development of a very special project for Western immigrants in Modiin.

Unique "Nof Zion" Real Estate Project Offers Buyers A Stunningly Affordable Opportunity

While there are a variety of real estate opportunities in Israel's capital city, none of them can be compared to what is taking place at "Nof Zion", a unique project that is offering buyers perhaps one of the last unobstructed views of the Temple Mount, Old City & the Judean Desert at affordable prices.

When the "Nof Zion" project was initially unveiled to the real estate market last year, sales representatives were overwhelmed with inquiries from all over the world, including the USA. Since that time, construction has begun in earnest on "Nof Zion". The key to this project is the fact that new neighborhoods such as "Nof Zion" haven't been built within Jerusalem in a long time. And in "Nof Zion's" case, this will most probably be the first & last opportunity to purchase a piece of property that guarantees a priceless view of Jewish destiny.

It is a recurring dream for many Jews to reside in a home overlooking the Old City of Jerusalem. "Nof Zion" has turned this recurring dream into a stark reality-a self-contained private neighborhood of nearly 400 apartments, built on 115 dunams of private land. This uniquely designed project will also blend into the natural terraces of the Jerusalem Promenade slope, providing every resident with a private terrace overlooking the Old City.

The exacting standards that have been set by the developer of this one-of-a-kind project – the Digal Investment Company – are of the highest quality. More importantly, the price of a 125 square meter "luxury apartment" (4 rooms) starts at only $320,000 dollars (5 rooms=150 sq. meter-$400,000). Suffice to say, residents of "Nof Zion" will marvel at the attention to detail that has been invested in the project.

In addition, "Nof Zion" is showcasing various types of apartments, some of which feature private gardens and penthouses. Aside from enjoying the spectacular view of Jerusalem, the "Nof Zion" neighborhood will include a commercial center, kindergartens, educational institutions, synagogues, health club, and will be conveniently integrated into Jerusalem's new public transportation system. Major public and government institutions are also slated to be built nearby.

Sales of "Nof Zion's" luxurious apartments are being handled exclusively in Israel by Anglo-Saxon Jerusalem. Sales of the "Nof Zion" project in the USA are being conducted by the company's American representative-Mrs. Gita Galbut. You can also visit the project's website at www.nofzion.co.il

Breathtaking Condos In Tsfat (Safed)

"Vacation Village Tsfat" is a new project consisting of private-suite condos that are now being offered for sale to Jews all over the world. By purchasing a Vacation Village Tsfat condo-unit, both family & friends will have a relaxing & congenial place to stay whenever you are in Israel.

These breathtaking suites are located on the mountaintops of the mystical Galilean town of Tsfat. Buyers will be able to enjoy many advantages that these condominiums have to offer, including a half-acre of lawns and greenery, high-level hotel service, catering facilities, sports/fitness center, shul, and private child care for residents.

Vacation Village Tsfat is superbly located in the heart of the Upper Galilee, just minutes away from the Sea of Galilee and within easy reach of major highways that lead to all areas of the country.

The average price per standard one-bedroom private-suite unit starts at around $79,000 dependent on various factors including upper or lower level suites and available views. For more information about this project, see the ad in this issue.

Holyland

Holyland Properties- Make Your Dream Come True..

For years, Jews have dreamed of making their homes in Eretz Yisrael. Countless individuals have left their jobs, sold their houses, packed their belongings and moved east to settle in the land of their dreams.

But even for those who've chosen not to make their homes there, Israel remains a favorite vacation spot. Year after year, people flock to the mekomos hakdoshim, to the Lag Ba'omer celebrations, to the Succos Festival etc. Indeed, Eretz Yisrael beckons. You too, may have felt the yearning. You too, may share in the dream.

Holyland Properties, a firm selling land, apartments and houses in Israel, is ready to help you realize your dream. With nearly two decades of experience behind them, they are a company you can trust and rely on to find you the perfect property, whether it's for a primary or second home.

Holyland Properties currently has many luxurious apartments – in Jerusalem and the surrounding suburbs– for sale, at terrific prices. Instead of spending money on an impersonal hotel room, enjoy Jerusalem's majestic views from the windows of your own beautiful apartment.

Owning a second home in Eretz Yisrael makes sense... personally and economically. But if you're not yet ready to buy a house or apartment, yet

Sea Opera

Netanya's New Concept In Gracious Living
By JAMES HARRIS

The "Sea Opera" real estate project is a new concept in gracious living. The developers and architects have designed a residential complex that is suitable as a year-round home as well as a holiday getaway. Sea Opera's 200-plus apartments were designed as year-round homes, while the location lends itself to a permanent residence or a holiday visit.

Sea Opera is situated in Netanya, opposite the sea, with every apartment displaying an excellent view of the Mediterranean. This proximity to the sea, a mere few yards away, means that in the summer residents can take a dip in the ocean or use the in-house swimming pool. Living in Sea Opera means that you can take a leisurely stroll on the seaside promenade just outside the residence or relax in the pleasant 6,000-square meter Sea Opera park.

Living in Netanya year-round is ideal for many reasons. For those who live in Sea Opera and want to work, the estate is within easy access of the modern industrial and hi-tech parks in nearby South Netanya, Herzliya, and Tel Aviv, as well as the commercial and financial centers of the Tel Aviv metropolitan area. Tel Aviv is 30 minutes away by car or train, while Herzliya is just 15 minutes away.

The relative proximity to the economic powerhouse of Tel Aviv is a great advantage; but for those purchasing a Sea Opera apartment as a holiday home, the attractions are mostly in Netanya itself. First, there is accessibility to all parts of the country. Jerusalem, Caesarea, Acre (Akko), Dead Sea, the Galilee, to mention just a few examples, are all within easy reach. Jerusalem is 90 minutes away, while Masada in the Dead Sea region, can be reached within two hours. Caesarea is only about 15 minutes away, and Acre less than an hour.

Netanya itself is also a great place to live. It is a growing Mediterranean coastal town with all the amenities and attractions one would expect from a typical coastal town in Spain, France, Italy, or Greece- including numerous synagogues. There are sea views and wide beaches, open-air cafes and restaurants, lots of entertainment, and an abundance of shopping centers.

For overseas buyers of Sea Opera apartments, Netanya is doubly inviting. Netanya has a large percentage of English-speakers from the U.S., England, and Canada, as well as expatriates from European countries, especially France. The majority of Sea Opera residents are English-speakers from America & England.

Besides being a magnificent home and holiday apartment complex, Sea Opera is the perfect investment. According to real estate experts, property values will continue to rise in the area. Seafront apartments in Israel aren't easy to come by these days, which is why Sea Opera is such an attractive option. Israel's most important financial daily publication, Globes, recently wrote that in the next five years seafront residences will more than double in price.

This is especially true of Sea Opera. It is located on Nitza Boulevard, Netanya's most exclusive street, and was built on private freehold land. Most other housing is built on land owned by the state. Since Sea Opera was built on privately owned land, the property will in the future command premium prices.

Nofei Illit

Nofei Illit: A Majestic View From Your New Apt. In The Heart of Modiin Illit

Thousands of frum families have discovered that Kiryat Sefer/Modiin Illit has become the most ideal location in Eretz Yisrael to purchase an apartment. The country's fastest growing Charedi city was conceived as a place where families could buy beautiful new & affordable apartments and enjoy convenient access to a variety of high-quality Mosdos Chinuch, shuls, kollelim, & mikvaot as well as pristine parks and shopping centers. Literally, a Torah-community built with a country-style atmosphere that is healthy for both body & soul. In addition, there are over 800 English-speaking families that live in this hub of Torah living, with many more on the way.

Kiryat Sefer/Modiin Illit is strategically located near many transportation hubs, making travel to Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Petach Tikva and Bnei Brak only 30 minutes away by car or bus. The airport which is only 15 minutes away, will be linked to the region by a new train line that is due to be completed late next year.

Because of these desirable features, Kiryat Sefer/Modiin Illit has attracted a growing number of families from English-speaking countries, particularly the U.S., Canada & the UK.

The Kiryat Sefer-Modiin Housing building company (which is building Nofei Illit) has been at the forefront of constructing thousands of high-quality apartments & town-houses, throughout the city. The Kiryat Sefer-Modiin Housing company designs apartment interiors to meet the specific needs of Charedi families, boasting large kitchen & dining areas, several bedrooms and options for expansion. A number of buildings also feature duplex penthouse apartments and garden apartments. Buildings currently under construction are being made with aesthetically pleasing Jerusalem stone exteriors, elevators, balconies for Succahs and outdoor patios.

"Nofei Illit" is located on a lush, green plateau in the heart of Modiin Illit and is designed for families who are looking for 3, 4 & 5 room apartments, built to the highest standards and featurin g large terraces & gardens. The views from atop "Nofei Illit" are breathtaking. Just imagine sitting on your terrace and staring at the biblical Judean Mountains or the Coastal Plain. Country living that's within close proximity to both Jerusalem & Bnei Brak.

And because Kiryat Sefer/Modiin Illit is considered a vital development area, new immigrants are entitled to attractive mortgages, which significantly reduce the overall financial burden.

Oz Vehadar

The residents of the holy city of Tsefat love their mountaintop home and wouldn't dream of trading in the fresh air of the Galil, the breath taking views and the feeling of holiness that envelopes the city every Shabbos and Yom Tov. Throughout its history, the holy city of Tsefat has been known as an important Torah center. Many great Kabbalists and Torah giants chose to make their homes in Tsefat, dating as far back as the Mishna and Talmud.

Once a remote city in the Galil, Tsefat is now easily accessible due to frequent buses from Jerusalem and Bnei Brak and the upgrading of highways and access roads leading to Tsefat. It's proximity to both commercial centers and nature reserves makes Tsefat an ideal home year-round or as a summer retreat.

Safed Gates is a residential project of the highest standard now in construction in Tsefat. Safed Gates upper Mountainview complex consists of four floors—spacious homes for those who desire a high standard and privacy. Each level of the Mountainview complex has only two apartments per floor, ranging from 4-5 rooms with a spacious living room and kitchen and large ad joining porches.

The lower terraced complex consists of eight floors with apartments each ranging from 3-4 rooms. All apartme nts have a Succa suitable porch as well as a second porch which can be used for future expansion. Some apartments have a garden. The complex is made up of eight floors. The size of the apartments are 3-4 rooms. The residential project offers its residents breath-taking views of Mount Meron and the Galil.

RBS-Aleph & Modi'in Buchman Are "Two of The Very Best"
By Staughton Clarke

"Some communities just keep getting better and better," observes Shelly Levine, CEO of Tivuch Shelly. The veteran realtor is referring to Ramat Bet Shemesh and Modi'in, two of her prime exclusive offerings.

* RBS-Aleph has a new development by veteran builder OR AMI, Ltd. located next to the popular neighborhood's commercial and services center. The 54 units now available are divided between two-family cottages (each with attic and basement), deluxe terraced apartments and towering pent-cottages. The builders are especially proud of the separate entrances, garage parking, central air-conditioning and southern exposures looking out onto hill-and-forest views, which characterize the project.

*Modi'in Buchman is home to SHARBAT BROTHERS "6 Stars of Buchman," a beautiful 4 and 5-room hillside development that offers a choice of either rolling gardens or large balconies. Gorgeous views that go on forever twin with high technical standards and central air-conditioning, parking and storeroom, all included in the price.
Modiin is Israel's fastest growing city and features one of the most active English-speaking communities in the country.

"Within Modi'in, it is clear to us that the most dynamic and desirable community, as well as the properties appreciating most quickly, are in the Buchman neighborhood," a spokesperson for Euro-Israel developers claimed.

Thus, Euro-Israel decided to make its move...and what a move it is! 144 spacious, exquisitely designed cottages neatly built on a picturesque mountain in "South Buchman."

Each home is approximately 170 square meters in size, with all of them featuring gardens and sweeping, panoramic views. Initial buyers include Israelis, as well as new immigrants from North America- religious and non-observant.

Euro-Israel builds top projects throughout Israel: in Jerusalem, Beersheva, Givat Zeev and now, Modi'in. Euro-Israel's building standards are of top international quality with precision professionalism and attention to detail. Sales are brisk, reflecting the uniqueness of the project, as well as the investment in the city's renowned quality of life.

Kfar Hamccabiah

Kfar Maccabiah's "2nd Home" project offers an ideal solution to the accommodation dilemmas of Jews and Israelis abroad visiting frequently for business, pleasure or living part of the year in Israel. Apartment-sized suite-units are listed in their owners' names in the Property Register ("Tabu") and are entirely free of municipal property taxes and other payments. When their owners are not in residence, the units are available for rental by Kfar Maccabiah Hotel to its guests, and the owners' share in the rental income. It is NOT a time-share scheme as the units are available at any time, whenever their owners desire.

The 20-acre Kfar Maccabiah complex is superbly located in the heart of Dan Region, next to the Safari Park in Ramat-Gan, minutes from Tel Aviv and the Mediterranean beaches, and very close to major highway interchanges affording easy access to all parts of the country. The 130-room Kfar Maccabiah Hotel, Convention & Events Center is one of Israel's largest Sports & Leisure Clubs, complete with 4 swimming pools, fully equipped fitness room and tennis courts, are all in a tree-filled setting of lush gardens and greenery. Established 50 years ago, the complex is owned by the Maccabi World Union, organizers of the famous Maccabiah Games (a.k.a. Jewish Olympics).

"2nd Home in Israel" is an 8-storey building offering 124 one or two-bedroom, fully-furnished and equipped units, of 500 or 750 square feet respectively. Innovatively, owners pay no maintenance, taxes or any extra bills besides charges for hotel services when they use their units. Owners enjoy all the services available at Kfar Maccabiah, ample parking, security, sports club facilities free of charge and discounted-price restaurant and other hotel services. Starting at $165k, prices for these high-quality suite units rise depending on size, floor and facing direction. Each unit includes its own fully equipped kitchenette (locked when owners are not in residence), dining area, living room, bedroom, en suite luxury bathroom, lockable storage area and balcony. 50 units have already been sold! Construction on additional sections will begin after the 17th Maccabiah Games in July.

Looking For A Top-Flight Real Estate Investment? It's All Right Here!

By: David Shamah

The first rule of investing, as everyone knows, is to buy low and sell high. The key to getting a good investment deal is to get on board early - before everyone else finds out about it! On the other hand, you want something that is going to appreciate to some extent in the short term, while retaining its value for the long term. The trick is finding investment opportunities that are on the cusp of a big move up, as well as moving quickly to ensure that your asset (s) is in place.

Fortunately for you, you're reading this article, which means that you are about to find out about one of the best places you can invest in, one that has proven itself historically time after time.

The name of the investment? Israel - its economy in general, and its real estate market in particular!

Once upon a time, astatement like that (vis-à-vis Israel) would have engendered disbelieving stares, if not outright guffaws. Israel was known as an over-inflated and overtaxed economy. As the old adage went, "If you want to make a small fortune in Israel, make sure you come with a big fortune."

But things have changed for the better. Israel has experienced extremely low inflation during the past several years. This year for instance, the inflation rate is a paltry 1.5%. And as far as taxes areconcerned, consider his little fact::

According to an OECD (Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development) report, Israel's tax burden, including income and property taxes, customs duties, VAT (sales tax) and national insurance payments totaled 28.6% of GDP (Gross Domestic Product, the total of goods and services produced) last year, much lower than in most Western countries. Only Mexico (19.5%), the United States (25.4%), South Korea (25.5%) and Japan (28.6%) had a lower tax burden as a proportion of GDP than did Israel. Most other OECD member states have a much higher tax burden, especially Denmark (49%) and Sweden (50.9%). Even the Swiss pay more (29.8%).

High-Tech & TASE Rebound

Israeli high-tech is back as well. During the first half of 2004, VC (venture capital) investments in Israeli high-tech companies were up over 50%. And with the recession of 2001-2002 at an end, the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange has been hitting historic highs. In fact, the TASE climbed a whopping 73.9% during 2003, with an additional 10.66% rise in the first half of 2004.

Foreign investors have been noticing the market's appreciation. Since 2003, investments by foreign residents have been on the rise. Investments in tradable securities from Jan. 2004-May 2004 have totaled $2.4 billion. During the past five years, the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange has also outperformed many world markets, including the key U.S. stock indices. TASE stocks have also outperformed the S&P 500 and the Dow Jones Industrial Average. Bonds, have also been performing well, thanks to the stability of the dollar vs. shekel rate and the Israeli economy's relatively steady interest rates.

Tax Update

Even the new Capital Gains Tax on investment income is not as scary at it sounds. Israeli residents are subject to a Capital Gains Tax on income derived from investments that top out at 15% - far less than the top 28% rate in the United States.

New immigrants can be exempt from these taxes altogether for up to 10 years, while foreign residents don't have to pay it at all. And if you're a dual citizen of Israel and another country, don't fret - Israel is a party to more than 35 tax treaties. The new tax reforms have not affected the existing treaties. If a taxpayer is liable both in Israel and abroad for the same income, double taxation relief is available - usually in the form of a credit for one or the other set of taxes. Tax reform has been on the minds of Israeli leaders for several years now. Cutting and rationalizing taxes has been a top priority project for Finance Minister Binyamin Netanyahu, whom many credit with Israel's low inflation rate as of late.

Hot Real Estate Markets

As far as real estate is concerned, the picture is very bright for potential investors. Prices have risen in some areas, most notably Ramat Beit Shemesh and Modiin, two up & coming communities that have proven very popular both for new immigrants and long-time Israeli residents. However, as a result of the building glut during the late 1990s and the recession of 2001-2002, prices have remained low in many other areas. But as with so many other bargains, savvy investors take advantage of low prices and drive them up. In Jerusalem, for example, prices on luxury projects are up 25% from the summer of 2003. As a result of this demand, developers are offering projects in all the Jerusalem neighborhoods from Rehavia, Talbieh, the German Colony, and Old Katamon down to Baka in the southern part of the city. The newest project in Jerusalem, Har Choma, has already shown handsome returns, with many apartments still under construction there.

The current low prices give investors the opportunity to buy property in desirable areas that will pay off now as well as later. For example, rents on starter apartments in the Tel Aviv and Jerusalem areas have been climbing in recent months, while prices on smaller apartments remain stable, making them a good mid- and long-term investment. For example, a two-room apartment in Ramat Gan or Givatayim now sells for an average $140,000, while the annual rental yield of an apartment like this can be $6,000 to $7,200, or from 4.62% to 5.14% a year. There are also many undervalued properties in what are currently considered "less desirable" areas of Tel Aviv, bordering on neighborhoods that are going through a gentrification process.

Demand is always high in the frum areas of Petach Tikvah and Bnei Brak. In these areas as families continue grow, prices and demand are almost guaranteed to rise. The fact that real estate in prime areas is a limited resource helps homeowners maximize their investments. There are of course, development towns like Betar Illit (near Jerusalem) where you can get substantial tax incentives on purchases.

Then there's commercial real estate, which has proven to be an excellent investment. Industrial zones, located on the outskirts of Israel's cities and towns, house a mixture of uses, including high-tech, manufacturing and warehousing tenants. Industrial zones also have been at the forefront of much of the recent growth in retail development. During the past few years, these areas have begun to take on many of the characteristics of suburban office parks, albeit with a higher concentration of development as is typical in Israel.

Another good strategy would be to look at properties in areas that are slated to rise in value within a few years, such as towns/cities that lie in the path of the ever-growing network of train tracks being constructed by Israel

Railways. For example, the government is building a rail line between Beit Shemesh and Jerusalem, as well as Tel Aviv & Modiin, which means that homes in towns located in the Jerusalem & Tel Aviv Corridors will likely rise in value as well. Foreign currency markets have helped make Israeli real estate even more attractive, especially for European investors. Why? Because, real estate in Israel is usually quoted in dollars. The dollar is going through a weak period against the Euro and but is stable against the shekel.

Getting In On The Action

What would one do if one wanted to get in on the action? Most Israeli banks offer mutual funds that investors can place money into (although the Knesset may soon require banks to get out of the investment business). This is probably the best way to get involved with the Israeli equity markets. Bank Hapoalim, for example, lists dozens of funds in its Lahak portfolio, which has a fund to suit every investment style, from an aggressive portfolio consisting of the TASE Tel-Tech Index (featuring high-tech companies like Comverse, Gilat, etc.) to a conservative blue-chip fund that invests only in large, stable companies (Bezeq, Teva, etc.), to "mixed bags" that invest in local and foreign stocks, as well as shekels and foreign currency. Many private groups also sponsor mutual funds with a variety of investments and returns vis-a-vis the "big" investment houses - Merrill Lynch, CitiBank Global, HSBN, etc. (Banks are prohibited by law from selling investors their own shares, so if you want to buy stock in a particular bank, you'll have to utilize the services of another organization). Of course, as always, you should check out a fund's prospectus before investing (nearly all have an English-language version of this document, if your Hebrew is not up to the task).

If real estate is your game, there are a number of considerations to look at, both in terms of government regulation and banking rules. Mortgages can be taken in shekels, or in nearly any other foreign currency (although banks are most comfortable with dollars). For shekel loans, a borrower will generally repay the loan at either a fixed interest rate, currently hovering around 5%, or a variable rate loan, with some rates below 5%. Customers also will pay a "linkage" component in addition to principal and interest that is based on increases in the Consumer Price Index, a holdover from the 1970s and early 80s when Israel experienced triple-digit hyperinflation and some form of linkage was necessary to protect lenders. While inflation generally has been nearly negligible over the past few years, the fact that the escalator linkage will be found in the contract, means that it could become a significant factor in payments. But the stable inflation and shekel rate over the past decade, has given banks the confidence to write unlinked mortgages as well.

How much do you have to put down? In the past, mortgage banks in Israel required you to ante up a high percentage of a property's cost as a down payment, but times have definitely changed. Each bank has its own formula, but generally they will look at your income. (Generally, the monthly payment should not be more than 40% of household income). Loans, depending on the area the property is located in and its value (the bank will send out an appraiser at its own expense), average 60 to 70% of the property's cost. However, if one takes out personal mortgage insurance (called EMI in Israel), which is offered by all mortgage banks, the bank will usually increase that amount, sometimes up to 90% of the property's value.

Once upon a time, apartment purchasers were required to make the rounds of friends and relatives to find guarantors willing to back their loans. Some banks may still insist on them. But the country's largest banks claim that this is also a requirement they no longer insist upon - unless they feel that the purchaser's income is unstable or not high enough to repay the loan. Interestingly, your purchase contract and mortgage documentation generally will list the price of the property you are buying in shekels, although you probably will have negotiated the price with the seller in dollar terms.

What if you prefer to conclude your deal in dollars? Israeli residents, as well as non-residents, can take out loans in foreign currency and pay back in shekels linked to that currency (usually dollars). Foreign currency mortgages generally carry interest based on the 90-day London Interbank Overnight Rate (LIBOR), plus a premium of approximately 1.75%. Individual rates will depend on the borrower's particular situation. Preferential rates are available for more credit-worthy borrowers. Banks generally also want a higher down payment (as much as 50%) of a property's value on loans of this type. With Israel's inflation rate low and stable, taking out a foreign currency-linked loan in dollars or Euros is far less attractive. Why? Because the currency exchange rates tend to fluctuate almost daily, making payback planning difficult if you are paying in shekels. Thus, the payment is bound to change every month - and is likely to be higher, given the historic trend of the shekel to gradually devalue vs. the dollar and Euro.

Once you have found the real estate property you want to purchase, one negotiates the price of the property either directly with a seller or the agent representing them. Then the lawyers (yours & theirs) take over and negotiate contract terms. Usually, you don't have to make an "earnest money" prepayment to enter negotiations; you come to a deal and provide an initial payment (usually 10% of the value) to seal the deal, and work out payment terms for the rest. (Unless you and/or the seller are in a hurry, payments usually extend over a period of up to a year). Escrow accounts are known but not common, as you usually make the final payment the day you receive the keys/title to the property. Realtor fees are similar to those in other places (1% to 3% of the deal, usually payable by both parties). Mortgage banks also require a life-insurance policy on the mortgage, which they will gladly provide. Recently, insurance companies also have entered the sales fray and claim that they are able to actually provide better coverage for less money.

As far as taxes are concerned: yes, you have to pay them. But the tax burden on real-estate transactions is not overwhelming. Buyers pay a purchase tax (significantly discounted for new immigrants) and a Value Added Tax (VAT) of 17% on new apartments or home purchases, which will be included in the price of the property. There is no VAT on secondhand purchases. Sellers pay a Land Appreciation Tax (mas mekarkiin) and, sometimes, a Betterment Tax (mas shevach) if the property value appreciates considerably. Again, there are discounts for new immigrants and foreign residents, as well as exemptions and discounts based on the property's location

Epilogue

Once upon a time, Rav Kalman Zev Wissotzky of Moscow, who had a close friendship with to Rav Yisrael Salanter, was one of the greatest tea merchants in Russia. In 1936, one of his descendants established a small tea factory in Eretz Yisrael. Today, long after Wissotzky's Russian holdings were plundered by the Bolsheviks, Wissotzky Tea is the best-selling brand in Eretz Yisrael! So pour yourself a delicious cup of tea and revel in the inspiration of investing in Israel!

The Law of Real Estate Property Agenting 5756-1996

By: Aharon Volk Adv.

1.- Introduction

1.1 As an attorney specializing in the field of real property many people from abroad who want to acquire property in Israel ask me questions that relate to "the real estate broker" in Israel. In The Holy Land, as opposed to England and the United States, for the sake of comparison, around 80 percent of the real property deals for dwellings are closed without the aid of a real property broker. In Israel the real property broker, regretfully, suffers from many negative attitudes – the impression that they are not professional people and sometimes not even honest, for example – that is our life in the Promised Land. In addition one should note that in recent years the situation in Israel improved a lot following legislation of a law on the subject of real property agenting, following rulings of law that were handed down in the courts, and most important, following the entry of real property brokerage offices that are professional and of high quality.

1.2 Recently I have encountered questions from foreign residents such as: "am I obligated to pay a brokerage fee in the event the real property broker gives me details about an apartment verbally?", "is the brokerage fee that the real property broker requests from me limited in amount?" "is the real property broker obligated to maintain discretion regarding the details I transfer to him?" "what is included in the service that the real property broker is obligated to give me?" and also, "when exactly am I obligated according to the law to pay the brokerage fee?" And so on and so on. I will expand on these questions and others further on, particularly with respect to service to our brothers in the nation of Israel who live in the diaspora and who strongly desire to acquire property in Israel. I also attest that I have tried hard to write in simple language as opposed to legal language so that the widest possible public will understand these things.

2. Conditions For Dealing As A Real Property Broker

2.1 In order to receive a license to deal as a real property broker the candidate must undertake certain actions. First of all, he must pass successfully a test on the subject of real property laws, planning and construction laws, and laws of real property taxation. In addition the candidate must pay a one time licensing fee at the time he receives the license and also an annual fee, etc.

3. Conditions For The Obligation To Pay A Brokerage Fee

3.1 A real property broker will be entitled to a brokerage fee only given the existence of a certain accumulation of conditions. The court shows increasing signs of flexibility regarding the conditions, but there is no doubt that if the real property broker is not meticulous about the conditions the chance exists that the court will deny the real property broker the right to a brokerage fee. And these are the accumulated conditions:

1. The real property broker must have a license to deal in real property brokering, as explained above.

2. The real property broker must have the client sign a written order for undertaking real property brokerage activity which includes, among other things, the name of the client and the name of the real property broker, the type of deal concerned (rental or sale), a description of the property that is the subject of the brokerage activity, the price of the requested deal, the rate of the agreed on brokerage fee including Value Added Tax.

4. Extent of Permissible Brokerage Fees and Tips

4.1 According to the law there are no limitations on permissible brokerage fees a broker may collect and therefore the brokerage fee must be agreed on with the real property broker in advance and not after the real property broker has shown the client the property and discerns that the client is enthusiastic about the property.

4.2 It is customary to request a maximum of 2 percent, plus Value Added Tax from someone who acquires an apartment or payment of a month's rent plus Value Added Tax from someone who rents an apartment.

4.3 Today, on account of the economic situation there are many real property brokers who after a short negotiation agree to reduce the brokerage fee to 1 percent plus Value Added Tax for someone who acquires and apartment or asks for a month's rent including Value Added Tax for someone who rents an apartment.

4.4 The client must verify that the real property broker writes on the order form the exact places he is about to show and should not be satisfied with a general address.

4.5 From my experience professional real property brokers justify the fees they receive for work done, if only that they make it easier for the clients to sift early on through potential properties, or perhaps their professional opinions regarding the value of the property, and perhaps surprising, but from my experience during negotiations a professional and reliable real property broker succeeds in reducing the requested price for the property in a significant way.

4.6 Not many know how to cause the real property broker to undertake all the actions that are in his ability to undertake. It is possible to request that the real property broker check who are the neighbors around the property, to check with the neighbors whether in the adjacent building to the property there are engineering problems, sanitation problems, nuisance problems such as noise, bad smells, etc. Ask the real property broker to prepare a list of similar properties to the desired property that were sold in the recent period or are on the market at that time.

4.7 In many cases a real property broker is prepared to take on himself the responsibility of transferring the meters for electricity, water and gas, and also the obligation for city taxes (Arnona) to the name of the person acquiring the property or renter, and because transferring these things is many times tied to wasting of time and bureaucracy it is worthwhile for that reason to accept such assistance.

4.8 The brokerage fee should be paid only after signing the contract and not after signing a memorandum of agreement. In addition it should be noted that in cases where the contract is signed and then cancelled the real property broker will be entitled to the brokerage fee despite the cancellation of the deal.

5. The Time When The Broker Is Entitled To Receive The Brokerage Money

In principle the court stated that the test of when the broker is entitled to the brokerage fee is if following the brokered deal the sides did indeed join together in an enforceable agreement.

So it emerges that sometimes upon signing a memorandum of agreement an obligation concerning a brokerage fee will be created even if afterwards a detailed contract between the sides is not signed and even if the deal is in the final analysis cancelled.

Comment: what is stated above is formulated in a general way but there are instances that are exceptional and out of the ordinary. For example: given the existence of certain conditions, someone at age 68 can receive a license without a test as stated in sub-paragraph 2.1.

Iran may have nuclear know-how in less than nine months: Shalom

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran may develop the know-how to make nuclear weapons in six to nine months, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said last Friday. He called on the United Nations to impose sanctions on Iran.

"Iran poses an existential threat, and that's why I think that the entire world understands that it's impossible to give such an extremist regime the possibility of having a nuclear bomb that can essentially threaten the integrity of the world," Shalom said on Friday in an interview with Israel Radio.

The day before, Shalom had warned that Tehran was close to knowing how to make nuclear weapons.

"Iran's announcement of their decision to renew uranium enrichment is, of course, a very dangerous announcement that must be viewed with appropriate concern," he told foreign diplomats at a reception at the president's residence. "Unfortunately, we see that indeed Iran will do everything to reach nuclear capability. The question is not whether Iran will have a nuclear bomb in 2009 or 2011.

From Poland to Israel: revelling in nationhood

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — March of the Living participants who landed in Israel last week after being in Poland could not kiss the tarmac as in the past because the gleaming new airport connects aircraft directly to the terminal.

March of the Living

But that mattered little. They were more than content, the consensus seemed to be, to kiss the Western Wall, celebrate Israel's 57th birthday with a May 12 March of the Living parade through Jerusalem, and leave behind Poland's relentless drizzle and nightmarish images of Auschwitz-Birkenau, Treblinka and Majdanek for the glorious sunshine of the Jewish state and the sheer sense of empowerment that came with Jews revelling in their own nationhood.

Poland, many participants said, is a nation obviously struggling to come to grips with its past. The ghosts of three million Polish Jews haunt Poland, a country that was a victim of Nazi oppression,

Groups Praise Budget

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto praised the Ontario government for its budget commitment last week to freeze post-secondary tuition and give more aid to students, as well as for pledging more money for child care and palliative care. But they criticized the Liberals for not helping families with students in non-Catholic faith-based schools. "The injustice that was done when education tax credits were taken away from students in faith-based schools continues to be ignored, and puts enormous pressure on families in our community," said federation president Leslie Gales.

TORONTO — Two CJN reporters are among 20 North American journalists who were chosen to take part in this year's Gralla Fellows Program for Journalists in the Jewish Press at Brandeis University. Toronto-based Ron Csillag and Elias Levy, The CJN's French-language reporter in Montreal, will attend the July 17-21 program, which is designed to enhance journalists' knowledge of Judaism and trends relevant to religion reporting.

Darfur Action Lauded

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress praised the federal government last week after Ottawa pledged $198 million for humanitarian aid and to support the African Union Mission in Sudan in order to help end the conflict in the country's Darfur region. Nearly 500,000 people have died and two million have been left homeless in a conflict in which a government-backed Arab militia has committed atrocities against the African population in the wake of a rebel uprising in 2003. CJC has been pressuring Ottawa for 18 months to take action.

WORLD

Pollard Petitions Court

JERUSALEM — Jonathan Pollard, claiming he has been tortured in jail, is appealing to the Israeli Supreme Court to be recognized as a "Prisoner of Zion," which would put more pressure on Israel to help him. Pollard, an ex-civilian intelligence analyst for the U.S. Navy, was sentenced to life in jail in 1987 for transferring classified U.S. intelligence to Israel. Israeli media reported that Pollard's lawyer has submitted an appeal claiming he was tortured while in U.S. custody. Pollard says he was repeatedly left naked in freezing conditions in solitary confinement and at other times was strapped in chains while guards doused him with ice water.

Citizenship Stripped

MILWAUKEE — A U.S. court revoked the citizenship of a Racine, Wisc., man who was a wartime concentration camp guard in Poland. Josias Kumpf, 80, admitted he stood by a pit in Trawniki containing dead and wounded Jews and was ordered to shoot anyone who tried to escape. He helped in "one of the bloodiest single-day slaughters of the Holocaust, the murder of 8,000 men, women and children," Eli Rosenbaum, head of the U.S. Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations said.

Old Shul Destroyed

MOSCOW — A historic wooden shul near Moscow was destroyed by fire May 10 in what local Jews say could have been arson. The synagogue in the village of Malachovka, 20 kilometres from Moscow, burned down before firefighters could reach the old building. Police said it was too early to blame arson. Rabbi Moshe Tamarin, who serves the small Jewish community, said the shul was burgled two days earlier. Police arrested a local man, but released him on condition he not leave the village. The shul was a key centre of underground Jewish activities in the old Soviet Union.

Columbia Students Back Controversial Prof

NEW YORK — Twenty current and former Columbia University students wrote to school administrators insisting that a professor had not harassed a pro-Israel student.

The students, who say they were in Joseph Massad's class on the day of the alleged incident, sent a letter May 3 to Columbia's president, Lee Bollinger, to other members of the school's administration and to members of a committee that found credible claims that Massad, an assistant professor in Columbia's Middle East and Asian languages and cultures program, threatened to kick a student out of class for holding pro-Israel views. The accusations "are unequivocally false," the letter said.

A report, issued March 31, found that Massad "exceeded commonly accepted bounds" in responding to a pro-Israel student's question about Israeli warnings before military actions in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Issa Mikel, a third-year law student and a member of Stop McCarthyism at Columbia, which argues that the accusations against Massad are part of an assault on academic freedom at the university, said group members and other students were to meet last week with Bollinger.

TORONTO — For those outside the literary community, it's sometimes hard to tell the difference between a Trillium, a Giller or a Governor General's Award.

But to writers, publishers and retailers, a literary prize can sometimes determine which books will make their way out of warehouse basements into the marketing channel so that they can finally land in the hands of readers.

In that respect, the bestowal of a Canadian Jewish Book Award (CJBA) can have significant meaning to those authors who have chosen to focus on Jewish content, says Miriam Webb, who is the current chair of the awards.

"Prizes, which range in value between $500 and $1,000, have much more importance than monetary value," says Webb, who is thrilled that a significant donation by Norman Glowinsky and Lillian Vine-Glowinsky will allow the CJBA to promote the importance of the event for years to come.

The awards were recently renamed the

The Canadian Jewish Book Awards were recently renamed the Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards in memory of the Vines, above, who were both Holocaust survivors.

Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards, in memory of Lillian's parents who were Holocaust survivors. Lillian's mother, Helen, died 14 years ago, while her father, Stan, died two years ago.

"This donation seemed perfect for my parents because art and literature were so meaningful to them," Vine-Glowinsky said.

"Even though my father wound up spending most of his post-Holocaust life in the business world, he really started out as an academic.

"Before the war, my father studied business and law in Silesia, a part of Germany that later became Poland. But when he arrived in Canada, he was in his 30s and felt that he couldn't go back to school."

He wound up pursuing real estate and property development, Lillian said. Yet, she remembers always having an image of her father with a book in his hand.

Lillian went on to describe her mother as a real romantic.

"She loved art and music," Vine-Glowinsky said, "and from a very early age she instilled me with stories and folk tales.

"One of my earliest memories as a young child is of my parents taking me to the bookmobile. That was a real ritual in our home."

"When my parents moved into their first home, they bought a piano before we got any furniture."

Vine-Glowinsky also recalled taking her children to visit her parents in Florida, where she met Isaac Bashevis Singer several times.

"It was so interesting to see this old and fairly infirm man and know that he had written these passionate books."

And now the mother of four children looks forward to passing her love of the arts on to her children – Lori and Avery Ross, Warren and Courtney Fireman, Lesley Glowinsky and Stefanie Glowinsky, as well as to her granddaughter, Lisa Brooke Fireman.

"I hope that literature will bring them as much joy as it has brought us," Vine-Glowinsky said.

The 17th annual CJBA award ceremony, which takes place on May 30, will celebrate winners in categories as diverse as biblical-rabbinic scholarship, biography, children's literature, Holocaust memoirs, poetry and Yiddish.

Consul's regret doesn't satisfy Muslim groups

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada's department of foreign affairs has "discussed" the recent controversial remarks of Israel's consul general in Toronto with Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker.

Consul General Ya'acov (Cobie) Brosh angered Muslim groups at a May 4 evening of Muslim-Jewish dialogue at Temple Har Zion in Thornhill when he said that while not all Muslims are terrorists, most terrorists are Muslims.

Islamic leaders in Canada asked Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew to investigate the remarks and seek an explanation from Baker.

"Foreign Affairs Canada has discussed the matter with the ambassador of Israel and we understand that the Israeli consul general will soon be meeting with representatives of the Muslim community to clarify the matter," department spokesperson Marie-Christine Lilkoff told The CJN last Friday.

Lilkoff said she was "not aware" of any plans by Ottawa to call in the Israeli envoy for a formal explanation.

"We have no doubt that this matter will be resolved quickly and constructively," she added.

Ofir Gendelman of Israel's embassy in Ottawa confirmed that contact had been made between Baker and the foreign affairs department regarding Brosh, but declined to elaborate. He said it was always Brosh's intent to meet with Canadian Muslim groups.

Meanwhile, local Muslims involved in dialogue with Jews say they are not satisfied with a statement of regret issued by Brosh for linking Islam with terrorism, but say they are willing to put the dust-up behind them.

Brosh, Israel's representative in Toronto and western Canada, issued a statement on May 11 addressing concerns raised at the program a week earlier.

Muslim leaders expressed shock and anger after Brosh stated that "the majority of terrorists in the world today are Muslims," and that moderate Muslims today are a minority.

He was also quoted by The CJN as saying that the notorious anti-Semitic tract The Protocols of the Elders of Zion is the best-selling book in Arab countries, and that the second most popular name in the post-9/11 Islamic world has been Osama.

The remarks were made at a program featuring Judea Pearl, father of slain Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, and Akbar Ahmed, an international relations professor based in Washington. Muslim leaders said Brosh's "provocative and hateful" remarks had the potential to hurt relations, and asked for an apology.

In his e-mailed response, Brosh explained that he "spoke as a citizen of a small and embattled country. It was never my intention to offend a group of people who have so fully demonstrated their personal commitment to the principles of dialogue and discussion – principles to which I have dedicated so much of my personal and professional life.

"Regrettably, I believe that my message was wrongly interpreted by some people who attended the event. I deeply regret if those to whom I spoke at the dialogue meeting took any offence from my words."

Farzana Hassan-Shahid, who's active in a local Muslim-Jewish dialogue and is president of Muslims Against Terror, said she "didn't see genuine contrition" in Brosh's statement, "and that's what I was looking for." However, Hassan-Shahid said she considers the matter over, and said she is looking forward to advancing local Muslim-Jewish relations.

Raheel Raza, a writer and leading proponent of better Muslim-Jewish ties, called Brosh's original remarks "very undiplomatic" and said he "skirted" the issue with his explanation.

"He says his message was wrongly interpreted. It wasn't." Raza stressed, however, that Muslims "have to come to terms" with the incident, and move on. "We're not going to bash this to death. We've made our point."

She doesn't think the incident will damage relations.

"Anyone cognizant of interfaith dialogue has to remember that there's a time and a place for politics, and for faith dialogue."

It's the politics that worries Tarek Fatah, a founder of the Muslim Canadian Congress.

"There really is a need to get ambassadors and diplomats out of Muslim-Jewish dialogue," he said. "It mixes politics and religion." Brosh's statement of regret "doesn't help. It further complicates things. It's not [a matter of] rejecting or accepting. I'm just disappointed he didn't get what we were talking about."

While Fatah wants to "get beyond this," he added: "I really think this is an issue for the Canadian Jewish community to take on. I would hope that someone in the Jewish community would sit down with [Brosh] and ask him what his statements about Arabs have to do with Jewish-Muslim relations here."

(In his explanation, Brosh said that "as an Israeli, my earliest experiences are that of being surrounded by countries that do not wish to speak, do not wish to argue, do wish to fight.")

Len Rudner of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress brushed aside the notion that Canadian Jews have a collective responsibility to condemn Brosh's remarks.

He said that when Lebanon's ambassador to Canada, Raymond Baaklini, alleged in 2003 that Zionists control the Canadian media, "at no time did [CJC] suggest that Arabs or Muslims condemn the statement. It had nothing to do with Lebanese Canadians."

WHY WE MUST SPEAK OUT

Non-Jewish Business Leaders Stand Up Against Antisemitism in Canada

We are pleased to announce the launch of a vigorous new offensive against antisemitism in Canada, funded and driven by a coalition of non-Jews, many of them leaders in the Canadian business community.

Under the banner of Fighting Antisemitism Together (FAST), this coalition of corporate citizens and business leaders was founded in response to the fact that 2004 was the worst year in more than half a century for vicious anti-Jewish activity in this country, a shocking 857 reported incidents. In the face of this resurgent evil we felt it was time to speak out.

Above all we resolved that we would not allow another generation of Jewish children to grow up feeling fearful and unsafe just because they are Jewish, and wondering if anybody out there really cares.

Well we do care. That's why FAST exists: to honour every Jewish child and promise the Jewish people they are not alone and on their own in Canada in this new century. We are dedicated to the safety and well-being of every Jewish child in this country and we want the whole world to know it.

Thanks to the commitment and generosity of the leaders listed below, FAST is working in partnership with the Jewish community to combat antisemitism in Canada. As we move ahead with this work, we also want to invite and challenge other non-Jews of good will to speak out against the "oldest hatred" in human history.

Survivors honoured at Queen's Park

Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah was marked auspiciously at Queen's Park, where Premier Dalton McGuinty honoured 14 Holocaust survivors and Monte Kwinter, minister of community safety and correctional services, recited Kaddish in the legislature.

At the annual ceremony, hosted by the Ontario government and sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, the premier presented 14 local Holocaust survivors with specially inscribed certificates in recognition of their "courage, strength and commitment to their communities."

Later, in the legislature, an emotional Kwinter recalled his March trip to Israel with two dozen Ontario police officials and his visit to Yad Vashem, the world-renowned Holocaust memorial and museum in Jerusalem.

"It was here that I found the name of the town where my father was born, Czestochowa, and the town where my mother was born, Sosnowiec," Kwinter told the House.

He called the Children's Memorial at Yad Vashem "especially sad. It commemorates the 1.5 million Jewish children who perished in Hitler's Final Solution.

"The memorial is carved out of an underground cavern, and memorial candles, the customary Jewish tradition to remember the dead, are reflected infinitely in a dark and sombre space. They reminded me of a million stars. As you stand there, you can hear the names of the murdered children, their ages and countries of origin read in the background."

At Yad Vashem's Valley of the Communities, Kwinter said those on the trip laid a wreath and he recited Kaddish, the mourner's prayer. He then asked for the legislature's unanimous consent to recite the prayer in the original Hebrew and Aramaic.

Consent was granted, and Kwinter recited the prayer.

Tory MPP Cam Jackson then rose to offer his support for Yom Hashoah. He went on to call for an amendment to the federal Criminal Code to include Holocaust denial as a hate crime "and for new, stringent legislation to prohibit the publication of hate speech while establishing clear sentencing guidelines for hate crimes.

"It is only by taking such decisive action that we complete the tribute we pay today to the victims of the Holocaust and ensure that 'Never again' becomes a reality."

Liberal MPP Ted Chudleigh, who introduced legislation marking the annual day in the legislature, noted that Ontario was the first jurisdiction outside Israel to recognize Yom Hashoah.

Today, it is marked in seven provinces in Canada and 26 out of 50 U.S. states, he said. "It would be my hope and dream that respect for minorities, respect for individuals, can spread in the same way that Holocaust Memorial Day has spread around the continent and indeed around the world," he added.

NDP leader Howard Hampton stressed the importance of remembering and the need to speak out against anti-Semitism, hate and racism.

"When we reflect, we see that some of these events still happen today, in Rwanda, in Darfur. Our world still remains a violent and oppressive place for too many people. Countries continue to put their own citizens to death and continue to use military violence against their own citizens. People still live in incredible poverty, without access to food and shelter," he said.

The 14 survivors who were honoured were: George Brady, Mordechai (Max) Feig, Aron Gerhard, Nathan Godfrey, Mendel Good, Anne Mandell, Mark Mandell, Israel (Ernie) Marmurek, Joseph Morgan, Philip Rechtsman, Albert Sliwin, Bernard Sliwin, Elise Kalles and Etty Zigler.

DROR DAGAN: FIGHTING FOR MY LIFE

Jerusalem: January 29, 2004: Terrorist attack on bus #19, kills 10 people, injures 50, and leaves 13 in critical condition.

Bethlehem: February 2, 2004: Israel sends an elite military unit to Bethlehem to capture the terrorists that had caused such devastation.

Dror Dagan, 23, a medic and officer in this unit, entered the terrorist's house where he was met by the wife, who feigned illness by falling to the floor. Concerned for the woman, Dror immediately ran to her aid. This allowed her husband time to organize his attack on Dror. Suddenly, Dror was shot, taking a bullet to his heart, and another to his head which travelled under his right eye and out through his neck.

"I remember lying on the floor and worrying how my family would cope with me dying and how foolish I was to worry about this woman and not my own mother. Then … I was fighting for my country, now … I am fighting for my life.

"I'm confined to a wheelchair and go to Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv 4 times a week. There, I receive physiotherapy, work out in the fitness room, weightlift, swim in the heated Olympic size pool and participate in wheelchair basketball. It's a place where I socialize with my new friends, and where I feel I 'belong'.

"The support and commitment of Beit Halochem is what helps me believe that in spite of my physical disability I can still enjoy my life!"

Bias masked as boycott

Great Britain's Association of University Teachers (AUT) is scheduled to meet on May 26 for a special session requested by some of its members to hold a "comprehensive debate" of the AUT's decision last month to impose a boycott of Haifa and Bar Ilan universities.

But some university faculties in Britain could not wait until then to distance themselves from the AUT's one-sided, clearly polemical, anti-Israel resolution. The British faculties at Oxford, Warwick and Sussex universities voted last week to reject the boycott. In further protest of the AUT decision, some members, including Shalom Lappin and Jonathan Ginzburg, resigned from the body; others, such as Oxford's Emanuele Ottolenghi, asked "to be added to the boycott blacklist" in solidarity with his colleagues in Israel.

The AUT decided to boycott Bar-Ilan because the university runs the College of Judea and Samaria in Ariel, which is in the West Bank. The association decided to boycott the University of Haifa because of the university's reproach of Ilan Pappe for his support of a student who wrote a thesis, subsequently discredited by the student himself, on an alleged massacre at the Arab village of Tantura in 1948.

In Canada, many academics are attempting to persuade the AUT to rescind its decision. The petition they are circulating states in part: "The boycott is counterproductive, racist and bigoted. It was voted on and approved under conditions which guaranteed its outcome without full and proper debate. It singles out the only Jewish state in the world for punishment, yet ignores the numerous despotic, oppressive, tyrannical, fundamentalist, and repressive regimes in the world. It is, for that reason alone, hypocritical, and represents the interests of a small minority of anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic activists only."

The boycott is an odious instrument being wielded in the equally odious campaign to delegitimize Israel. It should be rescinded.

Fax foul-up furor

Some people noticed that the government of Israel did not take part in the V-E Day commemorative ceremonies on May 8 in Ottawa. They wondered out loud, by agitated telephone calls and insistent e-mails to The CJN, whether Israel had been snubbed by the federal government or whether, for some reason, Israel had decided to snub the federal government. The reason for Israel's absence at the ceremony, however, was far more prosaic than dubious diplomatic dealing. The government of Israel was indeed invited to take part in the ceremony but did not know it had been invited. The invitations to all the foreign delegations in Ottawa were sent to them by fax machine. But by the coincidence of bad happenstance, on the day the invitations were faxed, the fax machine at the Israeli embassy malfunctioned. Thus, the invitation, though sent, never arrived. The embassay staff were not aware of the invitation and therefore could not respond. Had they known of the invitation to participate in the upcoming ceremonies, The CJN was told, they would have participated with full and grateful heart.

Freeze disengagement plan

Marc Gold's argument that the disengagement plan must be executed to uphold democracy is quite disingenuous ("Disengagement and democracy," CJN, May 5). If democracy is to be upheld, the disengagement plan must be frozen and new elections should be held for the following reasons:

• Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's most recent election campaign, in 2003, used the slogan "Nitzanim is like Tel Aviv" (Nitzanim is a Jewish settlement in Gaza). It was his opponent Amram Mitzna who advocated unilateral withdrawal. By switching platforms after the election, Sharon has misused the democratic process and disenfranchised a great part of his electorate.

• The largest, real democratic sounding out of Israeli opinion on this issue was the Likud referendum, in which tens of thousands of Israelis participated. The disengagement plan was voted down, but Sharon ignored the results.

• To achieve a cabinet majority for the plan, Sharon fired ministers opposing the plan even before the vote took place. Other Likud members of the Knesset were threatened that they could either support the plan or be banished to the back benches. Now that's democracy at its best.

• The residents who are affected by the plan were never consulted. (Imagine the Quebec government deciding to leave Canada without consulting Quebec citizens.)

• Sharon refuses to hold a referendum, even though polls indicate that a majority of Israelis support one.

The abuses in Bountiful

I am very angry that our provincial government in British Columbia has been so reluctant to stop the abuses occurring in Bountiful ("Free Bountiful's men and women," CJN, May 12). Finally bowing to public pressure, B.C. Attorney General Geoff Plant ordered an investigation last June. Since then, we have heard nothing.

I don't understand what can be so difficult about the Royal Canadian Mounted Police interviewing Jane Blackmore, the former midwife at Bountiful, and examining her records. Blackmore states publicly that her ex-husband Winston Blackmore (he of the harem of approximately 30 concubines and 100 children) "married" several 15-year-old children, and that the youngest mother whose baby she birthed was a mere 14 years old. Bountiful's girl children are denied equal education, and "excess" boys are excommunicated and dumped in nearby Creston.

Outraged by the government's inaction, eight women complained to the B.C. Human Rights Tribunal, charging four ministries (attorney general, education, child protection and women's services) with neglecting to uphold the human rights of the women and children of Bountiful. Their complaint was accepted immediately, and the public hearing takes place April 17 to 28, 2006.

There is no place in Canada for concubines, harems, and the cruel contravention of children's rights. What is happening in Bountiful is rape and pedophilia hiding behind the aegis of religion, and the sooner a stop is put to this travesty, the better.

Jews and indigenous peoples

As a woman with First Nations ancestry, it was heartening to read Avrum Rosensweig's column "Just Another White Man" (CJN, May 5).

There are some interesting parallels between genocidal atrocities directed at Jewish and indigenous peoples. The most glaring is the culture of silence that allows the horrible truth of our histories to remain outside of mainstream consciousness. I was 20 years old before I read about the Holocaust, and I remember having a hard time believing such a horror could be true. What is equally appalling is that I was 30 before I learned of the residential school system, of the Indian Act, and of the horrors of the systemic racism against indigenous people of Canada. I had a hard time believing that, too, but it answered a lot of my questions about my family. It was painful and liberating to know these things.

I sometimes feel discouraged by the lack of awareness regarding aboriginal perspectives on Canadian history. Many First Nations people feel frustrated about having to be the ones to educate people about our history. Some of my friends and I joke about handing a bibliography to people who are ignorant of aboriginal issues and saying, "Read these, then we'll talk!"

Second Harvest

I was interested to read Eli Stutz's article ("Putting food on the table," CJN, April 28) about Table to Table, Israel's perishable food recovery program. As the executive director of Second Harvest, I am familiar with Table to Table. Three years ago, Table to Table's executive director, Joseph Gitler, spent a week with us, learning how our operation works. As we have been in operation for 20 years and every day deliver fresh, donated food for about 12,000 meals, we were happy to pass on our knowledge and expertise.

We regularly receive food donations from bar and bat mitzvahs, weddings and shivahs, which we deliver throughout the city to 175 social service programs, including shelters, community centres, breakfast and after-school programs.

Anyone who is interested in learning more about Second Harvest or in helping us feed those in need in our community, please call us at 416-408-2594 or visit www.secondharvest.ca.

Yom Hazikaron 5765

Since the beginning of the Zionist movement, the Jewish community has faced, as the State of Israel now faces, waves of hostility, war and terror. Harassment, attacks and acts of murder have never ceased through all these years. No one knows better than you how deep the grief is and how profound the pain. However, the march of Zionism did not stop for even one second. In spite of those who hate us, the State of Israel was established, was victorious, grew in strength, and is stronger and more steadfast than ever.

We have prevailed, but we do not seek war; rather we desire peace. We hope that other families in Israel will never feel the sorrow and pain which you, the bereaved families, experience. In one hand we hold the sword to repel and eliminate any plot against the State of Israel and its citizens. Our other hand, at the same time, is extended in peace, friendship and neighbourliness. This year, the hope is more real, but the path is still long and strewn with obstacles.

We will proceed cautiously and determinedly. We will not compromise on our security, but we also will not forgo peace. We will not wait for the hour to arrive; rather we will make every effort to bring it closer.

The revival of the State of Israel and the building of Jerusalem – united eternally – in our time are the realization of a generations-long dream, of the vision of prophets, of prayer and our hearts' desire. We will give thanks tonight that we were fortunate to envision, and take part in, the return to Zion, the settlement of the land, the revival of Israel and the victory over our enemies.

However, we do not approach Independence Day on a secular note. We approach it only after the purification of the soul which comes with the Memorial Day for Israel's fallen soldiers and the victims of terror. We approach it with a combined feeling of shared remembrance and unity. We approach it while mentioning on this festive occasion the cost of liberty – liberty bought for us with the blood of the fighters in Israel's battles and of the victims of terror who fell at the hands of killers crazed with hatred. We approach the gates of Independence Day today united and arm-in-arm, and with us are the families who lost their loved ones in our joint struggle for existence, security and peace.

Dear families, when the shadows of evening begin to fall, together we will cross the threshold between Memorial Day and Independence Day. We will remember the fallen with love and we will strengthen you with our compassion.

Together, with pride and courage, we will raise the blue and white flag high on the flagpole. The strength to wipe the tears of our sorrow and carry the torch onward is our ultimate answer to all foes and enemies.

May the souls of your loved ones – our loved ones – be forever bound to the life of Israel. May their memories be blessed.

IDF soldiers and commanders: On the Remembrance Day for the Fallen of Israel's Wars, the entire nation communes in sorrow and grief with the memory of its sons and daughters, soldiers of the Israel Defence Forces, who sacrificed their lives in the ongoing battle over Israel's existence.

Generation after generation, we are forced to escort our finest to their final resting place. Young, talented people just starting to weave the fabric of their lives.

We are all one living human being. Whenever one of us dies, he or she leaves a void in the hearts of families, friends, commanders and the nation as a whole. Time cannot dull the pain. It only deepens our understanding of the magnitude and extent of our loss.

The absence of the fallen is felt by all: relatives, whose longing for their loved ones can never be fulfilled; soldiers of the IDF, whose hearts ache in memory of lost friends; and the entire Israeli people, who observe this grave loss in every walk of life.

The reflection of the fallen – their never-aging faces, the story of their life and death – will forever linger in our hearts. They walk with us wherever we go, in every step and thought. They constantly remind us of the great responsibility that rests upon our shoulders – to ensure life, security and well-being in the State of Israel and build a society, way of life and culture that are worthy of such sacrifice. Even after 57 years of independence, we are still forced to fight for the continued existence of an independent Jewish state in this land. Death and bereavement have plagued us once again this year. The memory of fallen brothers and sisters is a legacy for us to follow.

The commanders and soldiers of the IDF will continue to relentlessly fight our most justified battle for the existence of an Israeli nation in its land.

On this Day of Remembrance, the Israeli Defence Forces fly the flag at half-mast in love and pain, honour the memory of fallen comrades, warmly embrace the bereaved families, and join them in praying that no more names will be added to this long line of fallen soldiers.

Blessed be the memory of the fallen.

'We will remember the fallen with love and we will strengthen you with our compassion'

Identity and belonging

Julia Kristeva, the French academic and psychoanalyst, has written: "Subjectively, the issue of 'national' identity is that indistinct domain of psychic and historical experience which transforms identity into belonging." Israel has done precisely that for the Jewish people. It has radically transformed us all.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

As long as Jews lived in the ghetto, identity and belonging were one and the same, for Jews could only be at home in their own enclave. With emancipation, Jewish existence, for all its countless blessings, became more problematic. Could one be integrated into the surrounding society and yet be at home in the Jewish world?

Jewish identity remained almost indelible. Emancipated Jews who tried to obliterate it were usually frustrated by the refusal of non-Jews to accept their desire to assimilate. But many did their best to camouflage their identity as much as possible.

For the same reasons, belonging remained elusive. Whether they like it or not, Jews in the Diaspora, however seemingly integrated, are usually socially marginal. This can be creative and wholesome, as many writers and thinkers have demonstrated, but it is often also quite burdensome to be inside and outside at the same time.

In Israel, on the other hand, Jews have to work hard not to belong. The fact that many also have a secondary identity – e.g., as Ashkenazim or Sephardim, Anglo-Saxons or Russians – in no way impinges on their belonging to the Jewish people.

That is probably why, despite risks and hardships, Jews usually feel much more secure in Israel than elsewhere in the world. Even if anti-Semitism in the Diaspora may turn out to be less of a danger than it seems at present, it is nevertheless very much more difficult to feel at home there than it is in Israel. The feeling is, of course, subjective (as Kristeva pointed out), but it is very real.

If they are so much at home in Israel, why do so many Israelis travel abroad so often? Because belonging inevitably carries with it a large dose of provincialism. Being at home does not exclude the sense of being confined, ghettoized. Though they see Israel as their true place in the world, Israelis also need to occupy space elsewhere, at least periodically, to breathe more deeply.

Personally, I find this wholesome. It enables me to preserve my Jewish neurotic Diaspora identity (as the Israeli novelist A.B. Yehoshua has called it) and, at the same time, be committed to Israel where I am at home with my people, even if my neighbours call me an Anglo-Saxon.

Hence my advocacy of a mutual and symmetrical relationship between Israel and the Diaspora. The one needs the other. I feel truly privileged to live in both worlds.

It may be cliché, but I'm off to Europe

"That was a great column last month Jo – except it was a little bit too deep." Yes, when you're caught up in academic life, in term papers and seminars, it's easy to be consumed by academic material. Now, however, the school year has come to an end, my books are all packed away in boxes and philosophy is the furthest thing from my mind.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

In fact, I have come to accept that the very moment my last paper gets handed in, my brain takes a hiatus. While most people can't wait to sink their teeth into a great novel at the end of the semester, I can make no such endeavour. In fact, reading of just about any kind is impossible in the weeks following crunch time at the end of school.

This year, the problem seems more acute. In the past, the summer was simply a four-month break before another eight months of the predictable grind. But graduation and the end of my arts degree mark the end of the predictable and the known, leaving me to confront whatever law school brings.

It is hard to imagine not going back to Halifax – not walking the same tree-lined route to school, not running into the same familiar faces and not frequenting the same familiar hangouts. Actually, I just can't believe that four years have passed, and that, although I still see myself as someone who could be in high school, I will soon be entering professional school, my last gasp of student life before – perish the thought – I have to get a job in the "real world."

So, in keeping with the change motif, I have opted for a summer adventure that is anything but predictable. In order to improve my French before embarking on my studies at McGill University, I am going to spend three weeks in Paris in an intensive French program. By living with a Parisian family, I hope to become immersed in Parisian culture and take advantage of all that one of the world's greatest cities has to offer. After that, the graduation cliché will be mine – I am strapping on a backpack and heading to Italy, Spain and London.

Everyone is surprised to hear that I am taking this journey on my own, but, in typical Joanna fashion, once I got the idea in my mind, I had to pursue it. After considering my options for the summer, and quickly rejecting the monotony of most any job that I could get as a summer student, I decided it was time to travel. So when none of my friends had the same desire, I booked my ticket anyway.

Since that fateful day at Travel Cuts, I have given the same response to anyone who ask about my thoughts on travelling alone – I am partly thrilled and partly terrified. But to be honest (and further extend the post-graduation cliché), it's time for me to figure stuff out, to spend some time on my own without familiar faces and supporting hands.

The shock of graduation – the idea that I am actually graduating from university – has hammered home just how fast time flies. And knowing how fast these four years in Halifax whizzed by, I can't even begin to imagine how crazy the next three in Montreal will be. So I am taking the summer to explore – to explore Europe and to explore myself, and to attempt to revive my brain from its end-of-year strike.

For now, though, as I enjoy just being at home before travelling back to Halifax for graduation, I can enjoy a leisurely life of visiting friends and family, watching mindless television and making numerous trips to Ikea to make plans for my new apartment in Montreal.

While this brief period of relaxation isn't full of excitement and thrills, the coming months should offer more than enough of both.

Newspeak comes to the university campus

Guest Voice

Ralph Waldo Emerson, the 19th-century American poet and essayist, once said, "What you do speaks so loud, I can't hear what you say."

Unfortunately, on Canadian university campuses we are witnessing a reverse: through our speech, we can obscure public perception of our core beliefs.

Howie Fremeth in Vancouver

In George Orwell's 1984, the ability to transform speech so that meanings completely confuse society is epitomized by the Ministry of Truth's so-called Newspeak, a form of language that works by connecting diametrically opposed concepts: War is Peace, Freedom is Slavery, Ignorance is Strength.

Newspeak is now a common form of discourse for some campus politics, and Jewish students are often the targets. Two recent examples are "abortion is genocide" and "Israel is an apartheid state." But the long-term harm of these claims is that such spurious use of speech drains meaning from language.

"The Genocide Awareness Project" (GAP) is an exhibit organized by The Center for Bio-Ethical Reform, a Christian anti-abortion group that promotes its cause on billboards on university campuses using graphic images of violent historical events counterposed beside pictures of abortions.

The obvious intention is for the viewer to somehow agree that these images are all related.

Why does GAP engage in such a provocative form of advocacy? Is it to educate or influence? No. Such simple propaganda is too easily deconstructed. I believe their purpose is to inflame and anger, and that they also do this as a last-ditch effort. They see that the appeal of their anti-abortion cause is weak, especially among university students.

Fortunately, at some campuses, students involved in women's rights advocacy have ingeniously criticized GAP by spoofing their billboards. One example I saw at Simon Fraser University was a billboard that included a picture of open-heart surgery and the claim: "This is the grim reality of open-heart surgery. Ban it!" The message was clear – just because you associate an image of something that is generally accepted as evil with another image does not make them equal. Abortion is not the Holocaust.

Despite such criticism, the long-term effects of the GAP display are dangerous. It leads to a loss of understanding of the events it associates itself with, including the Holocaust. This is part of a larger trend. The meaning of the Holocaust is being obscured to the point of threatening all efforts to remember this dark period of human history. When attached to so many unrelated causes, the Shoah becomes a cliché.

Anti-Israel advocates who sometimes veil their cause with slogans that imply peace, equality and justice disseminate the second form of Newspeak on campus in their claims that the Israeli security barrier is an "apartheid wall" and the implication that "Israel is an apartheid state."

The best way to respond to these advocates is by asking them if they have actually seen the "wall." Better yet, show them a picture and tell them to notice one striking feature. There are two large holes at the bottom of each segment of the concrete part of the wall – most of the so-called wall is actually a fence. The purpose of the holes is clear. As soon as there is an end to hostilities against Israelis, a forklift can easily move in and dismantle the "wall." Contrary to the claims of some, the wall's purpose is to ensure security for not only Israel's Jewish citizens, but also its Arab, Muslim, Christian, Druze and other citizens.

There is very little depth to these language games. The words look good on signs and they get people's attention, but they are without power. The attempt to associate a weak cause with something powerful and meaningful is ultimately doomed to failure. It merely demonstrates a political group's inability to articulate its own cause.

But when our campuses are inundated with these false claims, we may lose our ability to have real communication and dialogue. When society actually needs terms like genocide or apartheid, they will no longer have any meaning. The only way to turn the tide is by adhering to Emerson's lesson and judging people by their actions and not their words.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Hannover

On a clear day in Hannover – an early Hanseatic trading city in Lower Saxony whose industrial fair is commonly rated as the world's largest – the mid-19th century neo-Classical opera house gleams in the sunshine.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

A citadel of high German culture, the ornate building, draped with a banner advertising Puccini's Madame Butterfly, stands adjacent to the Holocaust monument, known as The Jewish Memorial. Its close proximity to the opera house, a shattering juxtaposition, speaks volumes about the startling twists of German history and Germany's mercurial relationship with Jews.

Jews arrived in German lands with Roman legions. By turns tolerated, accepted and persecuted, they could never be certain of what the future would bring. And in Hannover, this was the case as well. Jews were comfortably settled in Hannover, a seat of Jewish learning, by the 13th century. But during the Black Plague, Jews were driven out. Although they were readmitted some years later, Hannover's Jewish residents experienced bouts of instability in the 16th and 17th centuries. They were forced out of the old city and then subjected to expulsion orders that were either cancelled or not carried out.

Jews acquired equal civil rights in 1808, but they were withdrawn in 1815. In 1866, when Hannover was incorporated into Prussia, the pendulum swung yet again and Jews were emancipated. The formation of a united German state in 1871, following the Franco-Prussian War, ushered in a golden age of virtual equality for German Jewry.

By 1933, when Adolf Hitler was appointed Germany's chancellor, almost 5,000 Jews, representing little more than one per cent of its overall population, lived in Hannover.

Among its Jewish inhabitants were Isaac and Rebecca Maissner, the parents of Benjamin Maissner, the cantor and music director of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple and the founder of Lachan, the Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir.

As he tells it, his family immigrated to Germany around 1917 from Poland. They left Hannover in 1936 after his father, a furrier, was beaten by the Gestapo while on a stroll with his wife. He was attacked because the Gestapo mistook his blonde wife for an Aryan, said Maissner, who was recently in Hannover to perform at a concert marking the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp. Traumatized by this incident, Isaac and Rebecca settled in Tel Aviv. And there, in 1944, Cantor Maissner was born.

The cantor's uncle, Israel Alter, a famous cantor, was a resident of Hannover from 1925 to 1935. Alter's last year there coincided with the passage of the infamous Nuremberg laws, which relegated Jews to second class citizenship and ignominy. Alter – whose stirring Hebrew-language recordings Maissner hopes to reissue in digital form – emigrated from Germany. Subsequently, he lived in South Africa and the United States.

Maissner's grandfather, Bernard, however, was not as fortunate. Arrested by the Nazis in Trieste in 1942 or 1943, he was shipped to the Lodz ghetto in Poland. There he died of typhus.

For the Jews of Hannover, the destruction of the main synagogue on Rote Reihestrasse was a turning point. Built in 1870 and expanded in 1900, the Moorish-style shul was destroyed on Nov. 9, 1938, during Kristallnacht, when scores of shuls across Germany were desecrated and burned in an orgy of anti-Semitic violence.

Not a trace of the synagogue remains today. But a plain monument, with a simple Star of David and slashes cut into one of its slabs, attests to its existence. There is also a representation of the synagogue in a scale model of Hannover in the impressive Neo-Baroque and Neo-Renaissance New Town Hall.

Though Kristallnacht marked the beginning of the end for the Jews of Hannover, they were subjected to a series of anti-Jewish edicts prior to its eruption. The most important of these occurred on Oct. 28, 1938, when Jews of Polish nationality were forced out of Germany. It was a chilling prelude to further deportations,

The next deportation took place in December 1941, when Jews were sent to Riga, Latvia. A succession of deportations followed – March 1942 to Warsaw, July 1942 to Thererienstadt and March 1943 to Auschwitz and Thererienstadt. Additional deportations to Thererienstadt occurred in June 1943, January 1944 and February 1945.

The names of the 6,800 deportees from Hannover are inscribed on The Jewish Memorial, a low, unobtrusive stone monument inaugurated on Oct. 9, 1994, 49 years after the the last batch of Jews were dispatched to a concentration camp by the Nazis. I jotted the names of several of the victims in my notepad: Arthur Eichmann, Giedon Ehrlicht, Margot Cygler, Ingebord Brand, Oskar Blumenthal, Lilly Block and Leopold Bergmann.

After the war, a handful of Jews returned to Hannover, and in 1963, a new synagogue, featuring beautiful stained glass windows, was opened. Situated in a leafy, affluent part of town, the shul serves congregants mainly from the former Soviet Union. The president, a man in his mid-40s, said that Hannover is home to 6,000 to 7,000 Jews today. My guide, Helga Menzel, put the number at some 4,000.

During a two-hour tour of Hannover, Menzel told me that approximately 7,000 civilians and soldiers were killed by Allied bombing raids in the autumn of 1943. Hannover was targeted because it was a railway hub, the site of oil refineries and a centre of tank production.

The bombings eradicated 80 per cent of the city centre and levelled all but 40 of its 1,600 historic half-timbered buildings. With Nazi Germany's defeat, the reconstruction of Hannover began. The new city, which has a population of 500,000, was built for vehicular traffic. The medieval city, of which there is a scale model in the marbelled lobby of the New Town Hall, was rebuilt with loving care and attention to detail.

Burgstrasse, with its half-timbered houses and cobblestone streets, is a facsimile of pre-war Hannover. One of the nicest buildings in the vicinity, the Neo-Renaissance Leibnitz House, was restored by Polish craftsmen in the 1980s. It is now a University of Hannover facility.

A model of Hannover's pre-war synagogue, destroyed in November 1938

No less striking is the 14th century Market Protestant church and the Old Town Hall, a Gothic structure that developers converted into a stylish shopping centre with smart shops and cafes. Nearby is Germany's first pedestrian mall, the Grupenstrasse, which opened in 1954. Hannover's liveliest street, Georgestrasse, leads to the legendary Kropcke Cafe and The Jewish Memorial.

Celle, a town of 75,000 about 30 minutes away by bus from Hannover, is a showplace of original 16th century half-timbered buildings. It is also the locale of Lower Saxony's oldest synagogue (1740).

On April 8, 1945, a month before Germany surrendered, Allied bombers struck a train carrying Jewish concentration camp prisoners. In what is now shamefully referred to as the "rabbit hunt," townspeople killed the survivors.

In the aftermath of World War II, 3,000 Jewish refugees, largely from Bergen-Belsen, crowded into Celle, briefly making it the biggest Jewish populated town in Germany. But today, no more than a few dozen Jews, some from Israel, live in Celle and its suburbs.

Shul to house Cantor Danto's music collection

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

On his 50th anniversary as a cantor, Louis Danto's dream of having his extensive music collection put to good use is coming true.

The cantor emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue is proud to have his collection of sheet music, records, tapes, CDs and books housed at the synagogue, where it will be available to the congregation and the community at large.

The congregation is celebrating the acquisition of the collection at its Golden Jubilee concert on June 8, featuring the Sons of Sepharad.

Lorie Goldfinger, chair of the collection committee, said that for now, a small sampling of the collection will be on display in the synagogue library, but they eventually hope to find a larger space.

Currently, he said, along with the cantor and his wife, Rouchama, and committee members Ben and Connie Kachuck and Andrea and David Kirshenblatt, they are in the midst of cataloguing it into categories that include cantorial, Yiddish, Hebrew, classical, arias, choir and solo, Italian, Russian, French, and school programs.

"It's a big job, but we're looking at how the community will benefit from this. We want the collection to be living and interactive."

In an interview at their home close to the synagogue, Rouchama Danto says that she and her husband view the collection as a treasure.

"It takes over the bulk of our house, but it is a lifetime collection. Many pieces were given to [my husband] by composers or cantors on their deathbed, and other pieces were composed specifically for him. It is truly unique.

"We continue to be amazed by what we have. We had no idea what was here until we started cataloguing. Every time we pick up a piece, we take time to study it. We've catalogued and sub-catalogued and cross-referenced. It is a labour of love."

A list of pieces in the collection "is very, very basic," said Rouchama. "There is just so much more. It's overwhelming. If you don't see it, you cannot imagine what it's all about. We can't count it, but [I'm sure] it has to be at least 20,000 or 30,000 pieces."

Boxes and file cabinets are loaded with material, she said. "Each piece tells a story. Some are inscribed by the composer, some were written specifically for [my husband]."

Her father, Dov Arieh Lebel, was a teacher of chazzanim in Israel, she said, and some of his pieces are in the collection. "He gave Louis a lot of works, including some that survived a flood in Tel Aviv.

Danto, who began singing as a child in Poland, was cantor at Beth Emeth for more than 25 years, before he retired in 1998.

When he was a child during the war, he escaped to Minsk, where he studied in the conservatory, and was later moved to Russia with a group of children. He studied cello and voice in Russia.

Over the years, he has performed worldwide. He toured eastern Europe, with stops in Moscow, Leningrad, Odessa, Kiev and Budapest. He also sang for Queen Elizabeth II and Prince Phillip at Maple Leaf Gardens.

It was on that tour that he discovered manuscripts of many classic Jewish songs, some of which he recorded. "Many of our congregants are of east European background, so they will appreciate this music," said Danto.

Rouchama said the work they are doing "is all about my husband's love of music. He eats, sleeps and breathes it. Music is a language that expresses whatever is in a person's heart. It is a tremendous tool. People who don't talk [about their feelings] can express them through song.

"We want people to discover this. We want people to see the tremendous variety of material, and we want them to put it to use."

Children's opera honours Holocaust survivors

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

When Dagmar Lieblova was a concentration camp prisoner at age 13, she took part in an opera and sang songs that offered messages of determination and hope during a very uncertain time.

More than 60 years later, her daughter Rita McLeod is determined to share the story with her community to honour her mother, who survived, and the hundreds of thousands of children who were victims of the Holocaust.

Brundibar, an opera that was composed by Hans Krasa in 1938 to give orphans in Czechoslovakia hope, or at least provide them with a much-needed distraction, opened in Saskatoon last week.

When Krasa was sent to the Terezin concentration camp (also known as Theresienstadt), northwest of Prague, in 1943, he secretly organized rehearsals for the opera.

Lieblova told the Globe and Mail that the Nazis eventually discovered the underground opera but tolerated it because they realized they'd be able to use it as a propaganda tool.

Lieblova is the inspiration behind the production, as she was one of the original cast members of the all-children opera, which was always in need of new performers as young Jews were being deported to Auschwitz.

The opera tells a story of a brother and sister who were on a mission to buy milk for their sick mother, but had to figure out a way to make some money.

Taking a cue from an organ grinder, the children sang in the hope that people would give them money to buy the milk, but the mean organ grinder shooed them away.

Eventually, the children came back with help from a dog, a cat and a bird and they were able to overpower the bully.

"It's a children's story about friendship with a message that if we band together, we can overcome evil," McLeod told The CJN by phone from Saskatoon.

Under the surface, however, the context of the play gives it a whole new meaning.

A song featured in the production sounds as if it was initially intended to empower the victims of the Holocaust to unite and stand up to Hitler and his Nazis.

"We are joining them in song/ Add your talents to our efforts, voice to voice and we'll be strong/ Pull together with our fold, right and justice we'll unfold/ Dictator, he'll be defeated, united we'll win our stand/ We shall give a good example to all people in this land."

It's the first time producing the opera for McLeod, who said that while there is a heavy underlying message in the children's story, it is a beautiful piece of music that speaks to people of all ages.

"This play will teach people about the historical context and that there is beauty in the face of adversity, evil, death and misery."

She added that contributing to the community with this play is "a small thing to do, but it is important."

Since February of last year, McLeod has been working to produce the opera, which she said would not have come together without the services of the Saskatoon Children's Choir sponsored by the Saskatchewan Music Educators Association.

"They're a professional group of actors that perform on a professional level," she said. "They also have a moral and social conscience. Last year they had a concert to raise money for a landmine treaty."

McLeod added that this play was "right up [the choir's] alley" in terms of participating in something with an important message behind it.

"They got right into it. They see singing as a way of connecting people and teaching them about important issues," she said.

What impressed McLeod was the enthusiasm of everyone who offered to help, regardless of whether or not they were Jewish.

Beside her, there is only one other Jew involved in the opera's production, but she emphasized that this is a story that applies to people of all religions.

"This is not a Jewish story. It's a story that involves everyone," she said.

That may be why people in the community were so eager to help.

"People were excited about the project. Anyone I asked for help jumped on the bandwagon. There were no real problems putting the opera together.

"I'm very excited about the play. It's exciting to see how people got together and donated their services. It was a community effort. It was a project that was meant to be," she said.

With several shows scheduled for this month in Saskatoon and Regina, McLeod said she would love to take the opera on the road, but travelling with a large cast of school-aged children could prove to be difficult and costly.

"We hope to go to Winnipeg, Edmonton and Calgary. We would be happy to go anywhere they invite us."

Downtown school going strong after 25 years

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The Downtown Jewish Community School is throwing a big bash to mark its silver anniversary.

The gala, an evening of comedy and live music, will be held at 7 p.m., May 26, at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, the school's home for the past 25 years.

"We've planned a great evening of comedy and music and there's going to be a fabulous silent auction," said gala chair Ted Winick. "We're inviting the whole Jewish community to come out and celebrate with us."

For people who love silent auctions, "there's some great items from trips to services to art and merchandise of all kind. Our roster of entertainers – they are basically donating their time – is very impressive," Winick said.

"And we've got some amazing musicians, who just so happen to be DJCS parents or parent alumnae. Bass player Richard Maslove, the music arranger for Canadian Idol, jazz guitarist and music professor Howard Spring, and pianist and band leader Jack Gelbloom are all coming out to support the DJCS.

"Their generosity is indicative of how much the downtown community has valued the school in the course of its 25-year history."

Joan Schoenfeld, the school's founding principal and a founding parent, recounted the events that led up to the establishment of the DJCS: In 1978, Jewish Family & Child Service did a survey to determine the size and needs of the downtown Jewish population. At the time, there were no holiday or cultural programs for families downtown, she noted.

Schoenfeld, who chaired the JF&SC downtown education committee, went on to start the school, which began its first academic year in 1979 with 45 children. Today, it has close to 200.

The school grew as more Jewish people moved to the downtown core or south of St Clair, she said.

DJCS gala set for May 26

In those early years, the DJCS ran holiday programs for the whole downtown Jewish community, because the JCC at the time did not run separate programs. Although both institutions are independent of each other today, they still continue to share many cultural and holiday programs, such as the annual Purim and Chanukah parties and an Israel fair.

"We've been in this building continuously for 25 years. We were here throughout the renovations," Schoenfeld said. "We made a commitment to the building as the centre of the downtown Jewish community years ago."

She recalled the days of the DJCS before the JCC was renovated.

"The building was pretty unattractive, but nobody cared. The tiny classrooms, the dilapidated hallways and facilities, that was all part of the panache. It's nice after all these years to enjoy a beautiful facility."

According to Schoenfeld, the goal of the school is to teach children how to live a Jewish life in a pluralistic environment through the study of Shabbat and holidays, prayer and Torah, and history and current events.

"The school is egalitarian. It does not make distinctions in religious practice between boys and girls."

The school offers classes from junior kindergarten up to Grade 10. Students from JK to Grade 7 meet Sunday mornings for 2½ hours of Jewish studies. Grade 2 students and older also study an hour of Hebrew on Sundays and have the option to study Hebrew for an additional 1½ hours on Wednesdays after school. Classes for students in Grade 8 and up meet Wednesday evenings.

Schoenfeld said the DJCS' challenge to make learning enjoyable, so children will want to attend. "We try to involve them by making the classes personal and meaningful."

She said the response to the 25th anniversary gala from alumnae parents has been very good. "We involved every past president in our celebration. Even Robert Matas, who lives in Vancouver was in touch with us.

"I'm very much looking forward to seeing the founders and reminiscing when we were all working intensely to get an innovative education experience off the ground.

"Here we are, 25 years later, and we're still going strong."

EXODUS DECODED
Exodus. The very word invokes an epic tale of Pharaohs and Israelites, plagues and miracles, the splitting of the sea, the drowning of an army, Moses and revelation. The story is at the very heart of Judaism, Christianity and Islam. But many historians argue that the Exodus is simply a myth. Jacobovici disagrees.

Jerusalem's newest institute

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

A group of eminent Jewish genealogists recently announced the formation of a new facility, the International Institute of Jewish Genealogy, that will be housed in the Jewish National and University Library of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Although still in an early stage of development, the institute's board expects it to become a major force in the world of Jewish genealogy within five years. They envision a foremost international research centre that will work co-operatively with existing facilities such as JewishGen, Yad Vashem, the Central Archives for the History of the Jewish People and the New York-based Center for Jewish History.

Until now, the burgeoning field of Jewish genealogy has been a populist endeavour, but the institute's proponents say it is time to bring it into the academy.

"We want to lift Jewish genealogy to new heights," said its founding director, Dr. Yosef (Neville) Lamdan. "We want to put it into the general framework of Jewish studies at a university level."

A fellow of the Truman Institute at Hebrew U, Lamdan is an Oxford-trained historian as well as a seasoned genealogist and a career diplomat who retired last year as Israel's ambassador to the Vatican.

Many in the genealogical world readily embraced his idea for the institute, and staff at the National Library were also highly receptive, he said.

"They were happy to welcome us, because they know they have collections of Jewish historical documents that really should be looked at again through the prism of Jewish genealogy."

Roots & Remembrance

Although there are now some 45 university departments of Jewish studies across North America, few if any have ever offered a course on Jewish genealogy, Lamdan noted, adding that the International Institute of Jewish Genealogy would eventually produce graduates holding bachelor's or master's degrees in Jewish genealogy. "We're hoping to open our doors for the academic year 2005-2006," he said.

One of the institute's early goals is to conduct a comprehensive global survey of all available Jewish genealogical resources. It also intends to host an early scholarly conference, establish standards of genealogical evidence, and locate new genealogical resources and make them available to researchers, both on site and via the internet.

The institute could help people doing DNA research to find families with certain genetic profiles, Lamdan said. Or it might index important collections such as the National Library's Paul Jacobi papers, an underutilized compilation of some 400 German rabbinic family trees.

It would also patriate certain Jewish collections to Israel if the opportunity arose. "Our purpose is to try and take an overview and tell genealogists where all the collections are. If we can also unearth collections that so far have not been found, so much the better. We'd be very happy if the institute could bring them in. Being situated in a library, we'd have a place to store them."

Institute researchers would clarify common misconceptions about Jewish life. For example, not all Pale of Settlement Jews were part of organized Jewish communities in cities or shtetls: at least half lived intensely Jewish lives in villages with no rabbis, synagogues, yeshivas, mikvahs or kosher meat, for which they were dependent upon neighbouring towns. "This is just one of a whole series of things that could be researched at a very serious level," Lamdan said.

Institute researchers would build on some of the fine work accomplished by JewishGen and other organizations, Lamdan said.

"JewishGen has done a fantastic job, but they're not a research institute and they don't operate at an academic level," he said. "We hope we would complement their work. I haven't got enough praise for JewishGen, but we will hopefully be working in a completely different area."

A beautiful tree grows out of a sapling

By RABBI YEHIEL BENAYON

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the Sephardi community in Canada and this article is part of a series chronicling the beginnings of the Sephardi community in Toronto.

Through A Sephardi Window

The Moroccan Jewish community's adoption of the North American congregational model for its synagogues was not easy. The concept of a synagogue being managed and maintained by its members was completely foreign to the Moroccan immigrants. As in the shtiebl system of eastern Europe, in Morocco, a family or individual would donate or bequeath a synagogue and then continue to virtually finance it on their own. Membership and democratic vote, as we know it, was unheard of. It was very difficult indeed for the Moroccans to swallow the concept of "pay to pray."

In the late 1950s and early 1960s, the Spanish Moroccans would gather for prayer in space at the Eitz Chaim Talmud Torah on D'Arcy Street. When this arrangement didn't work out, they moved to another synagogue basement, this time at Shomrai Shaboth just south of Bloor Street on Brunswick Avenue. When this synagogue on Brunswick was considering a move north, the Moroccans saw an opportunity to buy the building.

A delegation approached Barney Goldhar, the then-president of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society. They had little with them, only a dream. Goldhar not only approached the Toronto Hebrew Free Loan Society, he also personally guaranteed the money for the purchase. The cost was some $20,000, a small fortune for the newcomers.

With the further help of lawyer Wolfe Goodman of Goodman and Carr, funds were raised. Small repayments of the loan were made almost on a weekly basis. As these funds were turned over to Goldhar, he would issue immediate receipts and consistently include notes of encouragements. Through Goodman's interest in the project and by him bringing his many associates into the endeavour, the building was soon paid for.

The legal work, as well as much-needed legal advice, was provided by the Botnicks of Botnick and Botnick. They took great personal interest in the synagogue – they refused any payment and indeed made the Moroccans feel that they were a high priority for their prestigious firm.

Petah Tikva, the first Sephardi synagogue in Ontario, became more than a place of worship. It was the address of all Sephardi activity in Toronto. It was a de facto absorption centre. For newcomers, it was the place to meet and greet and hang around. And countless lifecycle events took place within those walls on Brunswick Avenue, including my own bar mitzvah.

From that small sapling planted on Brunswick, many branches of the community exist today. Presently, this same congregation is located on Danby Avenue.

One has to be forever grateful for these generous souls, for truly, without the likes of the Goodmans, the Goldhars and the Botnicks and their involvement in our community's inception, nothing of what we have today would have been realized.

Jewish Life

About life and death

In memory of Marjorie Baskin, 1927-2005

Death is a loss unlike any other because it embraces everything. When we die, we lose all the earthly things we know: music and mountains, family and books, food and wine, walks and sunsets, newspapers, sports and movies, and friends and loving relationships.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Death reminds us also of other losses. We mourn for a time that is gone, places once visited, adventures shared. The world rarely steals away but one thing at a time.

Every love story has an unhappy ending, and the greater the love, the greater the unhappiness when it ends. Whenever we love someone, we give a hostage to fortune. Whenever we permit someone to become very dear to us, we become vulnerable to disappointment and heartbreak.

What, then, is our choice? Never permit ourselves to love anyone? Never permit anyone to matter to us?

If loving is expensive, being unloved and unloving costs even more. Even in our grief, we can still agree with the sentiment of a contemporary writer: "To love and be loved is to feel the sun from both sides."

There is a legend of a sorrowing woman who came to a wise man with the heartrending plea that he return to her the son she had just lost. He told her that he could comply with her request on one condition. She would have to bring to him a mustard seed taken from a home entirely free from sorrow. The woman set out on her quest. A year elapsed and she did not return.

One day the wise man chanced upon her. He asked, "Why didn't you keep our appointment?"

She replied, "In search of the mustard seed, I came into homes burdened with sorrow and trouble. Who better than I could understand how heavy was the burden they bore? Who better than I could offer them the sympathy they needed? So I stayed on in each home as a prisoner devoted to service – and so the years passed."

Our sorrow can bring compassion as well as pain. The needs of others hitherto unnoticed, the anxieties of neighbours never before realized, now enter the ken of our experience. A bereavement that brings us into the lives of others writes a fitting epilogue to a love that had taught us kindliness and forbearance.

That is the message in Robert Browning's short poem Along the Road:

I walked a mile with pleasure,
She chattered all the way,
And left me none the wiser
For all she had to say.
I walked a mile with sorrow,
And not a word said she:
But, oh, the things I learned from her
When sorrow walked with me!

Perhaps the most compelling attempt to ease the loss attendant upon death is the belief that we will live on. Believing in another world makes the losses of this world less enduring and more bearable.

The philosopher Santayana called this hope "the soul's invincible surmise." But if it is a "surmise," it is one of mankind's most persistent surmises. From ancient man in his primitive beliefs down through the long corridors of time stretching into the present, most sophisticated faiths and men and women have held the human soul indestructible. Nor has this belief been limited to religious thinkers alone. Many philosophers, poets, physicians, scientists, answer "present" when the roll is called among the believers that death is not the end.

How the soul survives is, of course, a mystery. It is no less a mystery, however, than how the soul arrives. It originates with the source of all life and flows back to its origin. This source that Isaiah promises "will swallow up death and wipe the tears from every cheek."

Eurovision: hits of the present

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This week, singers from 39 countries are competing in Kiev, Ukraine, hoping to do their countries proud by winning the Eurovision Song Contest. The contest has fostered the careers of such international stars as ABBA, Olivia Newton-John and Celine Dion and of Israelis Shlomo Artzi, Avi Toldeno and Ofra Haza. Israel has won the competition three times and Shiri Maimon hopes to be the fourth winner this year.

The 23-year-old from Tel Aviv will perform the ballad Hasheket Shenishar (The Silence That Remains). Here's a translation of one verse:

I was blinded by the day's light
There was no more room for reason
Trembling at your side
My breathlessness has not finished
I breath you and the taste is bitter
[http://tinyurl.com/drzou]

Maimon has put together quite an elaborate website with a biography and a video gallery. [http://euro.shiri-maimon.co.il/]

Although Israel is not a European country, it has participated in the Eurovision competition for decades. Another Middle Eastern country, Lebanon, was set to make its debut this year. But those plans went off the rails when Lebanese television decided it could not abide by the Eurovision rules that state all entries must be broadcast in full by all member countries. The head of Lebanon's broadcast authority, Ibrahim Khoury, explained his withdrawal to the Associated Press. "Lebanon is in a state of war with Israel. If the Israeli contestant wins, we would have to show the celebrations. I cannot do this." [www.arutzsheva.com/news.php3?id=78739]

Actually, there will be two Israel singers competing at this year's Eurovision. The Israeli-born singer Ortal moved to France as a child. [http://tinyurl.com/cxgjy] She will be representing France and will perform Chacun Pense à Soi (Everyone Thinks of Themselves). You can check out Ortal's performance online. [http://tinyurl.com/ atu74]

There's one more (slightly bizarre) Jewish influence at this year's competition. The Hungarian entry, Spin the World, by the folk group Nox is a lively number that draws on a number of influences, including Hungarian, Georgian, Argentinian and Jewish folk music. [www.esctoday.com/specials/read/416] When you watch the video, you can see those various styles whiz by and then about two minutes into the song, the Jewish influence appears: a mass of stylized chassidic dancers, payes and all, dancing around a mini-skirted lead singer! [http://tinyurl.com/dtuzm]

Truth be told, not everybody is a fan of Eurovision. Writing recently in Ha'aretz, Sara Miller makes her feelings clear. "For those who are not subjected to this annual aural punishment, the Eurovision Song Contest allows the European nations (and Israel and Lebanon) to showcase a marathon of kitsch rubbish masquerading as singing and dancing." Miller took the opportunity to slag Eurovision because she was reporting on a strange sighting in Tel Aviv's Rabin Square. Someone has deposited a massive heart-shaped bouquet of red, blue and yellow roses in the square accompanied by a cryptic message that says: "Eurovision 2005/Angelica Agurbash/ From Belarus with Love."

As Miller discovered, Angelica Agurbash really is this year's Eurovision contestant from Belarus. But you'll having to read Miller's musings to discern Israel's connection to the Belarusian singer and find out why Angelica felt Tel Aviv should be graced with her floral favour. [http://tinyurl.com/aqzvr]

Alas, Israel has not fared all that well since its last Eurovision win in 1998. Although people are saying kind words about Maimon, the buzz is that Israel won't be bringing home its fourth Eurovision victory just yet. Eurovision music maven Graham Soult has this to say about this year's Israeli entry: "Shiri has a lovely voice, and it's a pleasant enough ballad… but I fear it simply isn't memorable enough to beat off the competition." [www.soult.com/eurovision/2005/israel.shtml]

Well, what does Soult know anyway? If you have a special feeling about Maimon, and if you want to put your money where your mouth is, the bookies will be more than happy to take your cash. Right now, the odds are sitting at about 40 to 1. [http://tinyurl.com/83j6c]

Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre names new executive director

Ellen Cole takes the reins

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

The Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (MNJCC) is an institution steeped in history and tradition, and the cornerstone of the downtown Jewish community. With the completion of extensive renovations to the structure this year, Ellen Cole has been named the new executive director of the Centre, where she will strive to bring the MNJCC into a new era that is respectful of the past and conscious of the future.

Cole has been working in communications and marketing for the past 21 years, most recently as the director of Communications for TV Ontario.

"This position at the MNJCC is an absolutely perfect confluence of what I have been doing and what I want to be," Cole explains. "Everything has come together for me."

Cole is also equally familiar with Jewish community life, volunteerism and the ways in which these two come together at the MNJCC. She is currently a regional officer of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and, for three years until 2004, was the Ontario regional chair of the Community Relations Committee at CJC. Cole says her background in Jewish community work has given her the sensitivity needed to direct a centre which caters to all ages and to all affiliations.

"During the selection process for this position, I had the opportunity to meet a cross section of the community that calls MNJCC home," Cole says. "Hearing how important this institution is, from the 90-year-old grandmother to the youngest child, was essential. This Centre is integral to the downtown Jewish community and I am very mindful of that."

The MNJCC offers a myriad of programs for children and adults, families and singles. It boasts a newly-opened state-of-the-art fitness centre and offers cultural arts events in addition to programming surrounding Jewish life cycles, holidays and Israel.

"As we look to the future, Ellen will help to promote our fitness centre, and steer the cultural and educational programming components of the MNJCC," says MNJCC president, Jacque Freidland. "This will make the facility the heart of the downtown Jewish community."

"Now is the moment for new beginnings," Cole emphasizes. "It is an opportunity for new relationships and a time for the MNJCC to create closer partnerships with not only the Jewish community but the Toronto community-at-large."

MNJCC offers a myriad of programs for families with children.

Israeli college caters to unique students

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA Federation

In Israel, Elias Imbram represents a minority within a minority. He's one of approximately 105,000 Ethiopians living in a country of six million people, but he's also among only 75 Ethiopian law students.

Imbram's legal training is taking place at Ono Academic College (OAC) - a unique post-secondary institution supported, in part, by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner.

OAC is unique because it specializes in students who are not always associated with campus life - Ethiopians who are working toward high-end degrees and haredim representing Israel's fervently Orthodox sector, for which higher secular education is not always a priority.

Founded in 1995 by director Ra'anan Hartman, OAC, with 4,000 students is, he says, "the fastest growing college in Israel, with the largest law school."

Hartman is especially proud of the school's outreach to non-traditional campus populations. One thousand haredim study there - there are separate classes for men and women - along with 71 Ethiopian law students.

"Of 30,000 active lawyers in Israel, only four are Ethiopian," notes Hartman. "A year from now, there will be 150."

With tuition fees set at about $6,000 U.S., Ethiopian students at Ono Academic College are heavily subsidized, paying only $200 a year. The balance is made up by both the Jewish Agency and the college itself. But Hartman considers this heavy financial obligation a necessity in order to help create a better Israeli society.

"To build leaders, we need to act in a leadership capacity," he says.

As for Imbram, he, too, has his eye on personal leadership. "I have a commitment to the Jewish people," he says. "If I want to lead, I need to be trained to do so."

A Ride to Remember

Forty Jewish motorcyclists from Toronto joined Jewish motorcycle clubs from across North America recently for a simultaneous ride to Washington's National Holocaust Museum in honour of Yom Hashoah, the worldwide day of Holocaust remembrance.

Toronto's contingent - "Yidden on Wheels" - which was sponsored by UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre, made the grueling 630 km. sojourn following a departure ceremony at Earl Bales Park. Groundbreaking for Lebovic Jewish Community Centre

Campus will become internationally celebrated centre of Jewish life

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

As the first shovel full of earth was hoisted on Sunday at the groundbreaking of what will become the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, a new chapter in Jewish life was underway.

Located at the corner of Bathurst and Weldrick in Vaughan, the 50 acre state-of-the-art campus - the first of its kind in Canada - will become an internationally celebrated centre of Jewish life, highlighted by CHAT, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, up to four elementary schools and countless other services for York Regions Jewish population of 60,000. Upon completion, the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus will be the world's largest location of Jewish day school students outside of Israel.

The campus - part of UJA Federation's $250 million Tomorrow Campaign, chaired by Gerry Schwartz and Larry Tanenbaum - will also feature a diverse range of family and social services, fitness and health programs, camping, child care, sports and conference facilities.

"Jewish education is critical to the continuance of Jewish life. It's something that the entire religion is based upon," said Joseph Lebovic, who, along with his brother Wolf, provided the generous lead gift which has allowed this project to become a reality. "Jewish education has always been a top priority of ours; it's something that is essential not only to us as a people, but also for our continuing impact in the world at large."

The Lebovic brothers, long active with UJA Federation, are philanthropic leaders in the community with an outstanding history of helping universities, hospitals, special-needs children, sports teams, and many other organizations.

"If you ask me what vision I have of this new community campus in five years, I would hope to see a community that is flourishing in every regard, strengthened by the programs and services offered there," said Joseph Lebovic. "I see it as a warm, welcoming place for Jewish families to excel and transmit Jewish values for generations to come."

Vaughan location of choice

The first Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, John Graves Simcoe had a difficult time developing Thornhill-Vaughan in 1792. As an incentive to cultivate the area, Simcoe offered settlers 200 acres of free land. In 2005, incentives are no longer needed. In fact, for the Jewish community, Vaughan has become the location of choice. Fifty-eight per cent of Vaughan residents are Jewish, making it the most sought out area for young Jewish families in Canada today.

As smaller Jewish communities across the country deal with population decreases, Vaughan's Jewish community is flourishing and continuing to grow. Part of the reason is that the general economic development of the area is attracting business and creating jobs.

"The general economic stability of Vaughan is a definite attraction," Patricia Tolkin Eppel, director of Community Planning, York Region at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto explained. "Coupled with the exorbitantly high cost of housing in the city, young couples are looking for options and finding those options up north."

Yet cheaper housing is not the only impetus to attract the Jewish community in such large numbers. Young Jewish families also look for an infrastructure that will enrich their lives and enhance their Jewish experience.

Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto (BAYT), an Orthodox synagogue that was established in 1981, was the focal point for an earlier generation of young Jews looking north to establish their homes. Twenty-four years later, BAYT acts as a beacon for other Jewish institutions, turning what was once farm land into a rich community that now boasts several synagogues, Jewish day schools, restaurants and shopping centers.

Jewish life north of Steeles is thriving.

"Joseph Tanenbaum had a vision for the area," explained Jack Feintuch, past president of BAYT. "He wanted to attract young people with a pioneering spirit and build a community not just a synagogue," he continued.

Temple Har Zion, a Reform shul currently boasting a membership of close to 600 families, has witnessed firsthand the growth of a Jewish presence north of Steeles Avenue.

"Temple Har Zion began 34 years ago with a membership of about seven families," said Karen Grimm, the synagogue's executive director. "Back then, we purchased the same piece of land we stand on today, on Bayview Avenue, which included a house. As the area began to grow in terms of Jewish families, so too did we. We're a vibrant and active Reform synagogue, and, in fact, we're still growing today."

Another York Region synagogue which has grown rapidly is Richmond Hill's Beit Rayim, an Egalitarian Conservative shul located at Bayview and Weldrick for the past 12 years.

"We've grown tremendously in the past decade after starting with only a handful of families as members," said Ronda Goldberg, immediate past president, Beit Rayim. "Today we have over 250 families aboard, mostly younger families. Our congregation loves it here because of the warm, Hamish atmosphere we offer. Everyone - regardless of background - is encouraged to participate."

The future looks bright for Jewish York Region

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

For over 100 years the Toronto Jewish community has migrated north creating major Jewish enclaves along the Bathurst corridor. Having already cultivated Thornhill, the Jewish community is now turning its gaze further north beyond Highway 7 where a new generation is deciding to set down roots and establish their homes.

By 2011, an estimated 86,000 Jews will populate York Region, which is already the third largest Jewish community in Canada behind Toronto and Montreal. Though York Region's Jewish community is large, it is not homogeneous, with individuals coming from diverse backgrounds and varying affiliations.

"This new generation of Jews, making the historical trip north, is a continuation of the progression of Jews northward that has been happening for the last 100 years," explained Lou Greenbaum of the Vogue Development Group, who was instrumental in the development of the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus and its steering committee, chaired by Leo Goldhar. "Yet, simultaneously Canada is also seeing an influx of immigrants from Russia, Israel and Argentina and many of them are finding homes in Vaughan," he continued.

The Atrium of the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus will serve as a welcoming gateway for the Vaughan Jewish community.

Greenbaum, whose belief in the Region is demonstrated by the fact that he is now developing the area, also has huge faith in the Jewish community and its desire to see a strong future there. As the chair of the Land Development Committee for the Lebovic Campus, Greenbaum has worked hard to create strategic relationships in the area.

"People are really beginning to become aware of what the Jewish community is doing with the new campus," Greenbaum explained. "I think young Jewish families are now considering this area because of what we are doing and how fantastic this Centre will be."

The new campus will include a recreation and fitness centre, banquet halls, a health and wellness centre, CHAT (the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto) and other social service facilities.

"I've lived up north my whole life and now my husband and I have decided to have a family and build our home here as well," said Heather Greenbaum, Lou's daughter. "Part of my decision to make my home here was based on this vibrant and dynamic community centre. It will be amazing to see how this whole thing evolves."

Canadians participating in Haifa conferences

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Hundreds of scientists, medical professionals, bioethicists and educators from around the world – including at least six from Canada – are expected at a five-day conference on medical, scientific and legal ethics in Haifa this month that will focus in part on the ugly legacy of Nazi doctors who performed scientific experiments on human subjects.

Timed to coincide with the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II, the International Conference on Science, Law and Ethics takes place at the University of Haifa from May 29 to June 2. It is being presented in English under the auspices of UNESCO, the World Medical Association and other international organizations.

Bernard Dickens, a professor emeritus of health, law and policy at the University of Toronto, is one of six Canadians on the conference's international scientific committee. "It's an important conference – some of the leading lights in the field are going to be attending," he said.

In the latter years of the Third Reich, Nazi doctors such as Josef Mengele used human beings as guinea pigs for a range of medical experiments.

Although various national and international models of bioethics and jurisprudence arose in the immediate postwar era, those measures "are no longer relevant to the requirements of modern scientific realities," according to Haifa Professor Amnon Carmi, the conference chair.

Conference proceedings are structured around three time periods: the war era, the subsequent 60 years, and the future. Subject areas include The Nazi Doctor, Experimentation in Nazi Germany, Euthanasia and the Hippocratic Oath, Research and Ethics in Russia and the Former Soviet Union, and Genetic Research.

"It's a very rich program," Dickens commented. "It focuses on where we have progressed, and on the progress we have yet to make on the values embodied in the Nuremberg code on research with human subjects."

A second conference, "World War II and Its Impact on the Law, 60 Years Later," is unfolding simultaneously at the university, and will examine historic injustices and legal claims related to the Holocaust. At least one Canadian, University of Toronto law professor Ed Morgan, who is also national president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, is slated to participate.

USCJ to honour three rabbis

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Canadian region, is honouring three Toronto rabbis emeritus with its fifth annual Ateret Kavod award.

"The community is very fortunate to have rabbis emeritus of this stature," said Paul Kochberg, regional president, referring to honorees Rabbi Avraham Feder, Rabbi Joseph Kelman and Rabbi Erwin Schild. "We thought the award was an excellent way of showing affection and respect."

The awards will be presented at a celebratory evening June 1 at Beth Tikvah Congregation. Funds raised support USCJ's youth programs in the Canadian region.

Ateret Kavod awards honour people who have made "significant contributions to the Conservative movement and the Jewish community at large," said Kochberg.

Rabbi Feder, who made aliyah in 1981, served Beth Tikvah for 14 years and is active in supporting the Masorti movement in Israel.

Rabbi Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue where he served for 38 years, has been involved in various Jewish initiatives for special needs children and adults. Among them, he founded the Kadima School in 1961, and was founding president of She'arim Hebrew Day School.

Rabbi Schild has served Adath Israel Congregation since 1947. For more than 20 years he has travelled regularly to Germany to speak to local Christians. He has been honoured by the governments of both Canada and Germany for his interfaith work.

Approach to Holocaust writing changed

This year's winners include David Bezmozgis for his book Natasha and Other Stories, Martin Lockshin for Rashbam's Commentary on Deuteronomy and Anne Dublin for Bobbie Rosenfeld: The Olympian Who Could Do Everything.

"If you trace the books that came in at the beginning of our history and the ones that are coming in now, you will find an incredible evolution in Jewish themes," Webb said.

"And they're not necessarily written by Jewish writers."

Another change Webb describes is in the approach to Holocaust writing.

"Holocaust survivors are getting older and almost not writing anymore… now we get second-generation writers."

In addition, Webb pointed out that many of the books coming in this year have dealt with Canadian and world anti-Semitism.

"It's so important to encourage writers and publishers to deal with Jewish issues," she said.

The Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards take place May 30, 8 p.m., at the Leah Posluns Theatre, 4599 Bathurst St. For more information, call Janet Mador, 416-636-1880, ext. 352.

New religions course mandatory

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Jewish day schools, like all other private and public schools in the province, will be required to teach a new course on major religions from a cultural perspective starting in the fall of 2008 or they will lose their government funding.

Charley Levy, executive director of the Association of Jewish Day Schools (AJDS), said he could see such a course being problematic, particularly for Orthodox schools. "It all depends on what the content will be and what kind of latitude will be give on the components that have to be taught," he said.

Another concern is how the Jewish schools are going to fit the course into an already heavy schedule, he said.

Levy said last week he had no other information about the course, other than what has been posted on the education ministry's website. He said he will be seeking more details and plans to call a meeting of the schools in the next few weeks to study the matter.

The AJDS represents 15 school corporations on 23 campuses, about 10 of which Levy described as Orthodox.

Rabbi Mendel Marasow, executive director of Beth Rivkah Academy, said he was not aware of the planned curriculum change but said he did not believe it would be feasible for his Orthodox school for girls to teach such a course.

"I don't think it will ever happen… We are not going to teach Catholicism, Hinduism and Islam here. Jews have given their lives in dictatorships not to have to teach [another religion]," he said.

Rabbi Marasow said he is confident the government will allow the course to be "adapted to fit the school's philosophy. It's common sense. They can't just dictate."

Education Minister Jean-Marc Fournier announced earlier this month that a compulsory course called "ethics and religious culture" will be introduced into all elementary and high schools to replace the current choices of Catholic, Protestant or neutral moral instruction. He was firm that even schools serving cultural communities must also teach the course.

Quebec has decided to re-invoke the notwithstanding clause of the Canadian Human Rights Charter to enable the current denominational classes to continue in public schools for another three years. The application of the clause was up for review in July, as is required every five years.

Fournier said the goal is to have all students following the same course curriculum so they can get to know and respect other religions. An outline of the course stresses that teachers must be careful to respect the individual beliefs of students and to treat the religions equitably.

The elimination of confessional instruction and the move to an academic study of ethics and religion is part of the long-underway process of secularizing the province's public school system.

אם זר קוצים בואב
זה מה שאת אוהבת,
אלך אל המדבר
ושם אלמד לכאוב.
ואם שירים אהבת
רק שכתובים באבן,
בין הפָּנים אגזר
ובסלעים אכתוב.

ואז, כשנתכסה
עם התולות בחושך,
וספר הדיברים
בחושך יתכסה,

תגידי לי מלים
יפות מבכי ואשר,
הוא כנראה אהב אותי
האיש הזה.

מה שחלם

מה שכאב לאיש הגיבן יותר מגבו
זה אותם מבטי התמלה שאסף ברחובות
ומה שאהב האיש הגיבן שנים כה רבות
-זו ילדת השכנים הפעוטה שהיתה בליבו.

ומה שהכאיב לאיש הגיבן מכל הכאבים
-זוהו מה שראה יום אחד בעיני אביו.
ומה שחשב אז האיש הגיבן בין קמטי מוחו
-אם תלך כל ימיך פנוף-לא תוכל למחוק.

Anti-racism conference draws variety of groups

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A grassroots effort to stop racism and hate in Canada brought local and federal politicians together with representatives of a wide array of religious and ethnic groups earlier this month.

"Towards Understanding and Harmony: a Conference on Hate and Racial Discrimination" was "a conference whose title reflects both what we are striving for and what we are hoping to prevent," said its chair Alti Rodal as she opened the event, held May 8 and 9 in Ottawa and attended by more than 100 people.

Rodal thanked the City of Ottawa for providing seed money for the conference, and she announced that the federal Department of Multiculturism would be funding its second phase, which will involve writing up and implementing some of its recommendations.

Elder William Commanda of Maniwaki First Nation in Quebec blessed the gathering with the burnt sage ceremony and a prayer in three languages as he welcomed participants to Algonquin land.

"I believe that our community has the capacity and the commitment and the leadership to take it one step further and that is to take a significant step toward reconciliation," Chiarelli said.

Bevan noted that the Ottawa police force established the first hate crimes unit in Canada in 1993 and that it still works diligently to fight hate crime.

"It is our belief that a hate crime against any one of us is a crime against our entire community," he said. "We must remember that our work in this area is a constant, constant voyage."

Messages of support were read and delivered by representatives of many faith communities, followed by a panel discussion setting the context for deliberations.

The conference continued on Monday at Saint Paul University, a Catholic school affiliated with the University of Ottawa, with a number of roundtable discussions and a keynote address by Justice Minister Irwin Cotler.

"The message of our democracies, the message of our governments, whoever is the party in power, the message must be clear that we envisage a state and a society in which there is no sanctuary for hate and no refuge for bigotry," Cotler said.

"The awareness of this substantial harm, the dangers caused by racism, hate speech and the need for a justice initiative to combat is the first and most important of the lessons learned and the actions to be taken."

Statistically, the two groups most targeted by hate in Canada are Jews and Muslims, he said.

"We need an approach where Jews speak up on behalf of Muslims when Muslims are attacked, and Muslims speak up on behalf of Jews when Jews are attacked, [and] when Jews and Muslims, in concert with others, speak up when any minority, any identifiable group, is attacked," Cotler said.

"That's what it means to have a notion of shared citizenship. That's what it means to have a common front against racism. That's what it means to mobilize a constituency of conscience in terms of both in all of the identifiable groups in our society."

He noted that the government's national action plan against racism, unveiled more than six weeks ago, has been been overshadowed in media coverage by the Gomery inquiry, but he outlined its 13 key points, as well as some of the steps the government is taking to fight racism, including a national tip line for reporting Internet hate and a national strategy to combat online hat.

CLARIFICATION

An article that appeared in the May 5 issue of The CJN ("Hamilton police chief faces complaints over Israel trip") quoted Hamilton Spectator columnist Bill Dunphy as follows:

"He [Dunphy] said, however, that the board routinely handles complaints in camera."

In a letter to The CJN, Dunphy denies having said this to our reporter Ron Csillag. "I never said the Hamilton Police Services Board handles complaints in camera routinely – I have no idea what their normal complaint handling process involves. I told Csillag that the board routinely goes in camera, that they deal with so many issues in camera that there were secret sessions at every regularly scheduled meeting."

Dunphy also said The CJN inaccurately quoted from a letter to the editor of the Spectator from Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber.

The CJN stated that Farber's letter accused Dunphy of failing to mention that the Ontario police chiefs who were visiting Israel also met with Palestinian leaders. Dunphy did mention the meeting with Palestinian officials in his original story and said, moreover, in his letter to The CJN that "Farber accused me [Dunphy] of 'glossing over' the visit. A very different allegation."

In this, both The CJN and Dunphy erred. Farber's letter said Dunphy gave "short shrift" to the meeting between the chiefs and Palestinian leaders.

The CJN regrets any inconvenience this may have caused.

Multifaith body provides affordable housing

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Multifaith Housing Initiative has purchased a five-unit apartment building as a step toward providing affordable housing in the city.

At the organization's recent annual general meeting, a plaque was unveiled to commemorate the purchase of what is hoped will be the first of many such small buildings.

The Multifaith Housing Initiative (MHI) is a group of representatives of faith communities and individuals who are dedicated to alleviating the problem of the lack of affordable housing in the Ottawa area. The group got together five years ago for an informal discussion and has managed to achieve one of its goals – to purchase a building.

MHI did not receive any government funding for the purchase of the building. People who are interested in ethical investments and are concerned about the city's lack of affordable housing made low/no-interest loans that went toward the purchase while others donated money.

The Jewish Community Council of Ottawa is a member of MHI, as is Temple Israel and Congregation Adath Shalom. Rabbi Arnold Fine of Agudath Israel Congregation is one of the organization's patrons. Rubin Friedman, a member of MHI's faith advisory committee and chair of the fundraising committee, represents the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa.

Friedman said he has been talking to the fundraising committee "about the Jewish approach to charity as justice – not just charity – which is not just being nice, but fulfilling fundamental obligations of justice."

He said he has found that the Jewish approach to charity is similar to that of Islam and he has learned a great deal about other faith groups by working closely with them.

MHI board meetings have taken place at various locations, including a Presbyterian church, a mosque and Temple Israel.

"What we would like to do is to expand the number of people who participate directly with us… We think we are providing a really important service to the community that everyone will benefit from," said Friedman.

In addition to purchasing and maintaining buildings, MHI is looking at other ways to alleviate the housing shortage, including finding secondary dwelling units in existing homes or operating a service for people who have extra room in their homes and are looking for tenants.

At the meeting, Ed Broadbent, the New Democratic Party member of Parliament for Ottawa Centre, where MHI's apartment building is located, commended MHI for its dedication to providing affordable housing, and criticized the federal government for not putting resources into housing.

"The voluntary sector has moved in to fill the gap. This is a needed, terrific example of what we can do for our fellow citizens, but it is important for the government to ensure that this gap doesn't exist," he said.

Broadbent stressed that Canada needs a national housing strategy. "There is no G7 country, except Canada, that has no national housing policy." he said.

Coast to Coast

As the mid-August disengagement from Gaza and settlements in the northern West Bank approaches, numerous articles have focused on the possibility of violent confrontation between settlers determined to remain in their homes and members of the Israel Defence Forces who will be charged with removing them – by force, if necessary.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Recently, however, other stories have attempted to sympathetically present the settlers' point of view as they await an uncertain future. In any other context, this kind of media exposure would have been most unusual, given the typically negative impression that the Western media present of the settlers.

Mark Mackinnon, the Globe and Mail's Mideast correspondent, profiled Len Benhamo of Gush Katif as he contended with "nightmares" over his future after 16 years in his Gaza settlement ("Anxiety sets in over fate of Gaza homes," May 7).

On May 8, CTV's Janis Mackey Frayer reported from the settlement of Rafiah Yam in Gaza. She described the predicament of Abashy Natif, a resident and owner of a small restaurant, who after two decades in the settlement is prepared to leave voluntarily, but must deal with both the hostility of many of his neighbours who are determined to stay and the absence (thus far) of any government financial compensation.

"The problem facing those who want to leave, is actually getting the money to do so," Mackey Frayer said. "With just over two months before it's illegal to live here, the government has yet to award any compensation. Families willing to go can claim over $300,000 (US). When applications were finally accepted, they were told it would take 60 days, leaving little time to find new homes, new jobs and new schools."

The following day, the CBC's Adrienne Arsenault interviewed the Hillberg family in the Gaza settlement of Nezer Hazoni, who expressed their anxiety as the disengagement date looms. "We're the people everybody loves to hate," said Breina Hillberg, mother and wife.

Arsenault followed up: "Misunderstood and mistreated is how Samuel and Breina Hillberg see themselves. They've lived in Gush Katif for 26 years and raised a family here. They were offered grants and loans decades ago to settle Gaza back when the government encouraged people to come and build successful businesses, which is exactly what the Hillbergs did. Now at 55, Samuel is trying to wrap his head around the idea of walking away from his hothouses and starting again."

Among other things, the Hillbergs wonder what will happen to the grave of their son, who was killed in Lebanon while serving as a naval commando. Breina Hillberg asks, "How do I pull up the grave of a kid who died for his country? Look what his country is doing to him now." The Hillbergs' emotional trauma was palpable, as was their sense of uncertainty about the future.

Like Abashy Natif, the restaurant owner of Rafiah Yam, Hillberg claimed that the government hasn't come to them with concrete plans for the move. Yet unlike Natif, Hillberg is not even decided on whether she will go voluntarily if there is government compensation or whether she will resist, short of resorting to violence, which she rejects.

Arsenault ended her report on a cautionary note: "The Israeli army commanders in charge of disengagement say it will be their most complicated mission ever. They'll have to guard against attacks from Jewish extremists and Palestinian militants. They have no sense of how this will end."

Although media attention in the Middle East has been mostly focused on Iraq, Iran, Syria and Lebanon in the past few months, many journalists are predicting a massive shift to Israel as the disengagement deadline approaches. As of last week, the Israeli Government Press Office had received close to 3,000 requests for press accreditation from foreign reporters and their crews.

It is hardly unreasonable to anticipate that in the (likely) heated atmosphere of disengagement itself, media attention may focus once again on stories of confrontation and conflict, not on stories about the emotional stress of individuals.

In the media's pursuit of sensational headlines, especially in a competitive news environment, will the human interest stories be relegated to a mere blip on the radar screen?

Hundreds gather to pay respects to fallen Israelis

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

After the Royal Canadian Legion and flag-bearing boy scouts marched down the aisle at Beth David B'nei Israel Beth Am to the beat of a drum, more than 500 people stood for a moment of silence to commemorate Israel's fallen soldiers.

The Yom Hazikaron ceremony included poetry, prayer, candlelighting and song, as well as emotional testimony from those who have lost loved ones in Israel's fight for peace.

Helina Berkman and Hani Ben Shabat solemnly made their way on stage to light a memorial candle in honour of Berkman's husband, who died fighting in the Yom Kippur War, and Ben Shabat's brother, who was killed last year in a terrorist attack in Tal Hashomer.

Israeli Consul General Ya'acov Brosh, who's father fought in four Israeli wars and witnessed the untimely deaths of many of his fellow soldiers and friends, told a story about a young man from Boston who urged his parents to make aliyah to Israel. He joined the army, where he and Brosh met, and they became good friends. A year later, the young man was killed in battle.

This was just one example of the thousands of people who sacrificed their lives for the right of the State of Israel to exist.

"Twenty-one thousand, nine hundred and fifty-four men and women were killed, many who suffered for our existence. It's a number that the human mind cannot imagine," Brosh told the attentive gathering.

But when the crowd wasn't listening to the speeches and poetry recited by children, they sang along to songs such as Bab-el-Wad, which is about the area where Jerusalem was separated from the rest of Israel during the 1948 war, and Hakotel, a song that commemorates the soldiers who died in the 1967 war.

Rabbi Philip Scheim told his congregation that Yom Hazikaron is an outlet to pay respects to those who died so that Jews could have a state to call their own.

But more than that, he offered a message of hope and strength for the future and reminded the gathering to take pride in the accomplishments of a democratic country that thrived against all odds.

"We taught the world what it means to dream defiantly, what it means to go against history and military odds, technological challenge, out of the desert, out of the death camp – how to fashion a stunning, flourishing miracle," Rabbi Scheim said.

"The secret to our survival has been the sound of the voices of Jewish children from the schools and study halls, the sound of Israeli children laughing and playing and shouting in the parks, the playgrounds in the cities and towns – these are people's most precious sounds, our greatest national resource."

He added that it is in the quest to protect this precious natural resource, to preserve the dream of living in a peaceful Israel that has cost us the lives of so many loved ones.

"Bringing the dream to life has come at a high price. The human toll is great. The number of korbanot [sacrifices] continues to rise and brings us here to tonight's gathering of zikaron, remembering the precious thousands upon thousands of Israeli soldiers, men and women, young and old, who gave their last breath for the sake of Jewish children, for Israeli children, for the sake of our future," he said.

Before the 500-person gathering and the Renanim choir stood to sing Hatikvah as one strong voice, with the emotions running so high that it brought some to tears, Rabbi Scheim reminded everyone why we must continue to persevere in a land surrounded by hostile neighbours.

"In the survival struggle that we've been forced to wage, on Yom Hazikaron, we pray for that normalcy of real peace. [We must continue to fight] for what is rightfully ours and what must forever remain ours."

From tears to hope at Toronto commemoration

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Pain to joy, tears to hope – these were the emotions evoked by a darkened sanctuary becoming brightly lit and by the words of the speakers at this year's Yom Hazikaron/Yom Ha'atzmaut commemoration at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

The evening was sponsored by the Mizrachi Organization of Canada, Emunah Women of Toronto, Yavneh Olami of Toronto and Bnei Akiva of Toronto.

Under lights dimmed for the Yom Hazikaron portion of the program, Rabbi Moshe Shulman, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim, said Jews recognize that life is not a fairy tale, ending with "and they lived happily ever after."

Rather, he said, Jews understand that life has pain and tears, and challenges and shame, but because we have faith in God, we maintain hope in the ultimate good.

The rabbi recounted a story about Rabbi Yosef Ber Soloveitchik, one of the major Orthodox theologians of the 20th century, who was asked if the Israeli flag should be considered holy. Rabbi Soloveitchik replied that just as the clothes of a martyred Jew become holy because of his sacrifice, how much more so does a flag "soaked in the blood of [many martyrs] become sanctified."

Rabbi Shulman also recalled that Rabbi Tzvi Yehuda Kook, one of the spiritual leaders of the settlement movement in Israel, used to leave his yeshiva on Yom Ha'atzmaut to walk the streets and watch the "amcha" – ordinary, generally non-Orthodox people – dance and celebrate. He always felt that it was vital for all parts of the population to feel that they were all one.

God, Rabbi Shulman said, doesn't want the Jewish people to be divided. In fact, he said, the Second Temple was destroyed and the people scattered because of sinat chinam (baseless hatred). "He cares about our unity, about our love for each other and for the land of Israel."

He said he heard that some spiritual leaders were advising Jews to not celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut this year. "I cried when I heard that," the rabbi said. "We must stand together. We must celebrate our differences, and work together as one people, with faith that God will protect Israel."

People celebrated as Yom Ha'atzmaut festivities began.

Israeli Consul General Ya'acov Brosh decried those who constantly complain about the State of Israel.

"We should be proud that although we have had to defend ourselves 11 times in the 57 years since the state was founded, we have successfully absorbed 20 per cent of our population, brought over 7,000 of our brothers and sisters to Israel from Ethiopia in 48 hours, and went from a land with no industry to one in the forefront of high technology, and one with no water to one that sells expertise about it to the rest of the world," he said.

"We have so much to be proud of, so much to thank those who are no longer with us for."

Youngsters from Bnei Akiva, the religious Zionist youth movement, read from a story written by D.T. Epstein. Overlapping voices told of a young Israeli man and his family doing ordinary things – planting trees, going for walks, spending time with friends, building up to his mixed excitement and fear about going to the army, and moving somehow inexorably to his doom.

The Yom Hazikaron part of the program also included a prayer for Israel's missing soldiers, sung by Rabbi Natan Knadler; K'El Maleh Rachamim, sung by David Bernstein; and a memorial song titled Shema Yisroel, sung by Rabbi Avichai Zehavi. A memorial candle was lit by Eliana Goldberg and Efraim Figdor, niece and nephew of former Torontonian Chezi Goldberg, who was killed in a suicide bombing in January 2004.

The atmosphere changed abruptly, it seemed, as the sky darkened outside the sanctuary and the lights were raised, and the solemnity of Yom Hazikaron changed to the exuberance of Yom Ha'atzmaut.

A video of the day the state was declared was greeted by applause, cheers and whoops of joy, as was a traditional daglanut, a stylized parade of Israeli flags, presented by girls from Ulpanat Orot, the girls school of Yeshivat Bnei Akiva, and from Bnei Akiva; and a medley of Israeli music by the Netivot HaTorah children's choir, resplendent in sparkly blue and gray vests.

David Bernstein concluded the service with the Yom Ha'atzmaut Ma'ariv and additional prayers mandated by the Chief Rabbinate of Israel. Dancing, music, flag waving and general hijinks followed the services.

Yom Hazikaron/Yom Ha'atzmaut

'Our independence didn't come free,' Baker says

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — For three days running last week, people in Ottawa gathered in large numbers in solidarity with the State of Israel.

Community-wide observances for both Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut, organized and sponsored by the Embassy of Israel and the Vered Cultural Program of the Soloway Jewish Community Centre, were both held at Congregation Agudath Israel.

On Tuesday, May 10, a solemn ceremony marked Yom Hazikaron, the day of remembrance of those who lost their lives in the defence of the State of Israel.

Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker reminded those present that in Israel, everyone is affected and that he, too, has fought for freedom. "I am standing here before you now as an Israeli soldier like every other Israeli soldier experiencing a ceremony like the ceremony we are experiencing this evening. Listening to the songs, listening to the prayers, takes me back to my own personal friends that I lost during my own personal service in the Israeli army as an artillery soldier on the Suez Canal in 1973," he said.

Referring to the reading of The Silver Platter, a poem written by Nathan Alterman during the 1948 War of Independence that is often read at Yom Hazikaron ceremonies, Baker said "Our independence didn't come on a silver platter and didn't come free. It comes with a heavy loss… as much as we celebrate our independence, we will never be able to truly celebrate without this cloud, without this feeling of loss, without the deep gratitude to those who lost their lives in order to allow us to celebrate."

Brig.-Gen. Ilan Baram of the Israel Defence Forces addressed the assembly and read, in Hebrew, the IDF Order of the Day.

Two nights later, in the same venue, a more festive gathering celebrated the 57th anniversary of Israel's independence with singing, dancing and abundant Israeli food. The evening's host was Dalia Baker, Baker's wife, who thanked the Ottawa Jewish community for the warm welcome she has received since the couple arrived nine months ago.

A special tribute to Naomi Shemer, Israel's beloved songwriter who died in 2004, was written by Sara Vered, a veteran of the War of Independence, and narrated by Barry Karp. With a backdrop of slides of Israel projected onto a screen, the Raneinu Choir of Yitzhak Rabin High School performed some of Shemer's best-known songs.

The Embassy of Israel also held a gala celebration of Yom Ha'Atzmaut at the Canadian Museum of Civilization last Wednesday evening, May 11. More than 600 people, including diplomats from various embassies, Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew, Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, MPs and members of the Ottawa Jewish community were feted in grand style.

The food was arranged in stations representing a map of Israel, with each station's fare representing its location. For example, the Haifa station featured fish, while "the cafes of Tel Aviv" offered coffee, wine and juices.

The evening also featured a jazz group led by acclaimed Israeli saxophone player Yeruslav Yaakobovich.

Zionist youth groups celebrate Israel's birthday

With a sea of Israeli flags, a nargilah café and hundreds of people dancing to Israeli grooves, you'd think you were in Tel Aviv.

In fact, it was a club in downtown Toronto bubbling with the spirit of Zionism last week as some 300 celebrants partied the night away in honour of Yom Ha'atzmaut.

"I'm having a great time," said participant Jodi Katzess, 21.

"I've been a proud member of the Zionist movement my whole life… and I feel I need to show my support this way."

The event, held at Club Mod on College Street and titled "Partying on Yom Ha'atzmaut Tel Aviv Style," was put on by the Zionist Partnership, a conglomeration of the various Zionist youth movements in Toronto that aims to put political and religious differences aside to promote unity in the support of Israel.

"Every Zionist youth movement has their own organization and they plan their own events," said Orna Hollander, regional director of the Israel Program Center and USD/Hagshama.

"But our common denominator is that we love Israel, so we have a partnership of all the Zionist movements in Toronto where we have events together… conveying a united front."

The evening was filled with Israeli culture.

Television screens showcased images of life in Israel, from pioneers toiling in the fields to people partying in the streets. Massive Israeli flags adorned the walls, women donned blue and white leis and all the guests munched on Israeli snack foods.

A disc jockey spun Israeli hip pop, rap and trance, and in true Middle Eastern fashion, revellers puffed away on the nargilah patio.

"I feel like I'm at a Yom Ha'atzmaut party in Tel Aviv," said Itay Gadot, executive director of Betar-Tagar.

"It's a really authentic vibe."

Since starting up a year ago, the Zionist Partnership has planned several successful events, including the screening of an Israeli film at the Bloor Cinema that attracted a sold-out crowd of 850 people.

"What is happening in Canada is something really special," Gadot said.

"All the youth movements under the Jewish Agency are working so well together and bringing great events to the community. This is something unique, and now delegations across the world are paying attention to what is gong on here."

While many of the party attendees were out to have fun in the name of Israel's independence, some waxed philosophical on the meaning of Yom Ha'atzmaut.

"We're celebrating 57 years of democracy and freedom for Jews to live in a state of their own," said Dave Horowitz, 25.

"It means that any Jew, from any part of the world, can travel to Israel and live in Israel without fear of persecution."

Hollander said the Zionist Partnership intends to plan more events in the near future and urges those interested to visit the websites of local Zionist youth groups for more information.

New hate charges laid in Ryerson case

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Kevin Haas, 21, who was charged in October in connection with anti-Muslim hate incidents at Ryerson University, now faces two additional counts of wilful promotion of hatred.

The charges were laid only last week because in such cases, police must first receive the consent of Ontario's attorney general's office, said Det. James Hogan of the Toronto Police Service hate crimes unit.

Last fall, Haas was charged with seven counts of mischief under $5,000 and two counts of threatening death. The charges related to a 2004 summer campaign of anti-Muslim and anti-Jewish leaflets and graffiti at Ryerson. Among the incidents, the school's multifaith room was spray-painted with the words, "Die Muslims Die," as well as Stars of David.

Hogan declined to be specific about the material for which Haas was charged last week, but said they were "some of the same material and posters that were placed in various locations on campus, and materials that he distributed."

The charges each carry a two-year sentence if Haas is convicted.

Scholars hold conference at London's JCC

The London Jewish Community Centre is hosting the first day of the annual conference of the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies (ACJS).

The conference takes place at the community centre on May 29 and continues on May 30 and 31 at the University of Western Ontario, as part of the Congress of the Humanities and Social Sciences.

Established in 1976 as the Canadian Jewish Historical Society, the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies (ACJS) provides a platform for well-known scholars of the Canadian Jewish experience working in an array of disciplines.

Ira Robinson of Concordia University, a past president of the ACJS, says the conference is often an "eye-opener to those who have perhaps never thought of Canadian Jewry as possessing a rich history, literature and social structure." Indeed, the titles of the presentations, from "Soup, Bread and the Dole: Welfare in the Montreal Jewish Community in the '30s," and "The Art and Science of Building a Database for the Jewish War Veterans of Canada" to "Sexism and Anti-Semitism in the Experience of 10-Year-Old Jewish Girls" attest to the program's diversity.

The ACJS Conference is free of charge. Registration is required to attend the sessions held at the university. For more information, call 519-673-3310.

but also one where, as former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir once alleged, the children imbibed anti-Semitism along with their mother's milk.

One evening, marchers in Poland recalled the Polish citizens who risked their lives to save Jews – and such heroes did indeed exist. But so many others, apparently the great majority, either did nothing, looked away or fully supported the persecution of the Jews.

While earnest efforts are underway to revive Jewish life and recognize the legacy of the great Jewish civilization that once existed in Poland – about 20,000 Jews now live there out of a population of 38 million – it remained unclear whether awareness of such initiatives trickle down to the average Pole.

How, some March participants asked, could Poles live literally within metres of Majdanek, which is adjacent to Lublin, opening their apartment windows to see crematoria and gas chambers that look as if they closed down yesterday? How can some Poles take a shortcut path, walking right through that camp, between the mountain of human ashes and the ovens?

"It doesn't get any easier, that's for sure," said Max Eisen, 76, of Toronto, who was liberated in 1945 after surviving a death march. "It's very emotional."

This year, as in the past, the main goal of the March was to have new generations of Jews to bear witness once the survivors are gone, and the primary target was still 16-year-old Jewish high school students. But the scope was more ambitious because of the 60th anniversary of V-E Day. The total Canadian delegation of about 1,000 this year also included university students – Jewish and non-Jewish – young adults, municipal leaders, educators and adults, mostly from Montreal and Toronto, but also from other Canadian cities.

Ask the participants – from the youngest through to the survivors – the effects of the trip, and you got a full range of responses.

Sidney Nemes of Montreal saw the survival of his 75-year-old father, Robert, as a defiant victory over the Germans. "Three thousand years from now, this chain will not be broken," he said within yards of one of the only fragments remaining of the Warsaw Ghetto wall.

At Treblinka, under a canopy of green on an incongruously warm and sunny day, Hebrew University historian Paul Lipps spoke of the "confusion" involved in trying to "make sense" of what took place. He said he started to devote his life to Holocaust memory after seeing a Polish wedding reception on the grounds of Treblinka.

Montreal participant Adelia Bensoussan said she was "horrified by the lack of what I see" at Treblinka, where, in contrast to Majdanek, which remains completely preserved, the site has only stark monuments and a symbolic road of railway ties.

Non-Jewish students Meaghan Lang, 21, of the University of Regina, and Rafi Mustafa, 22, a journalism student at Ryerson University in Toronto, felt the trip gave them much to think about.

"It's been very emotional," Lang said. "It makes you question yourself." Persecution, she said, can start with something as simple as bullying and proceed from there.

Mustafa saw the Holocaust, "not just as Jewish problem, but as a human one."

On the trip as part of a project for a CBC radio documentary, Mustafa said it is vital to transcend the Holocaust's ethnic dimensions by seeing how other communities have also suffered from genocide.

At an event at Warsaw University honouring Righteous Gentiles the last evening in Poland, some Toronto teens told The CJN the trip was difficult but worthwhile.

"There was a lot more pain than I expected," said Melissa Rosenberg, a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). "When you come here, you really get a feel for what happened. Textbooks only take you so far."

On the other hand, "there wasn't only pain on this trip, there was life, Jews all reaching out together," added Jordana Hart, also 16 and a student at CHAT.

At the ceremony, Canadian Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, in remarks that stirred participants, said the legacy of the March of the Living trip has to translate into action, or the program is nothing more than rhetoric.

At Warsaw's Chopin Airport prior to leaving for Israel, 19-year-old student Zack Nemes, Sidney Nemes' son and a member of the Montreal young adult group led by Rabbi Reuben Poupko, said the ceremony at Warsaw University moved him greatly.

"Back then, Jews had nowhere to turn," he said. "Now they can go to Israel."

As has always been the case, organizers said, there was no one way young people would react to seeing the places where a whole Jewish life was wiped away in a few years. Some cried many tears, others nary a one. Some were members of the second or third generation of survivors, others had Canadian roots going back generations. Their common bond was their Jewishness and devotion to Israel.

The activities both in Poland in Israel were marked by small, memorable moments:

• At the 200-year-old, now neglected Warsaw Jewish Cemetery (Gensia), non-Jewish students from the Moscow International Film School sang Avinu Malkeinu, shedding tears for children they never knew;

• At the Monument to the Ghetto Heroes designed by Natan Rapaport, a man at one end of the plaza sold ghetto souvenirs to tourists; at the other end, a visiting Lubavitcher from Israel approached visitors asking them to lay tfillin;

• Sharon Levine, co-chair of the Montreal adult delegation, noted how, on the El Al flight to Warsaw, the pilot told the group how important the trip was. "Now we can come and go as we please," he said. "Our ancestors couldn't do that."

• The Sabbath was welcomed at a Kabbalat Shabbat at the Holiday Inn in Warsaw, with students singing and dancing in frenzied joy on top of tables, the boys and girls in competition over who could sing loudest. The noise was deafening, the gestures suggesting: "Here we are, alive Jews, and we will continue to be!" A similar outpouring of emotion took place at the Novotel Hotel, with young people going right out onto the streets.

• At Warsaw's Nozjek synagogue the next morning, which can barely summon a minyan on Shabbat, the shul teemed with visitors from the March. Irwin Cotler sat next to March national co-chair Ralph Lipper. Cotler was given an aliyah. A sefer Torah was donated to the shul, and there was more joyous dancing around the bimah. The only synagogue in Warsaw to survive World War II (there were 70 before the war), it was used by the Nazis to stable horses.

• At Majdanek, March of the Living co-ordinator Shauna Waltman, standing on a windswept monument surrounding the mound of human ashes, read a personal letter from her survivor grandmother, and cried.

• The first day in Jerusalem, in the back of the plaza near the Western Wall, Montrealer John Zentner proposed marriage to Jessica Glazer. She cried, accepted, and their entourage danced mazel tov around them.

• Yom Hazikaron was ushered in at an evening ceremony on the shores of Yam Kinneret (Sea of Galilee) in Tiberias. There were no speeches, only the sombre recitation of the names of those who have died. The audience was quiet. On a rooftop not far away, a security man watched every movement with binoculars.

Every group experienced other such moments.

Noah Kochman, 17, a student at Herzliyah-St. Laurent in Montreal, felt he was given a good "foundation" about the Holocaust and Israel before the trip. But his "emotional connection" came with identifying, not with the six million, but with one.

"I realized that it was best to make an emotional connection with one person and to hold the memories," he said, and then to bring that memory back to other people. "We are the next generation of witnesses."

Montreal survivor Rena Schondorf, who was on her third trip, was accompanied by her husband Mayer, also a survivor. She felt that because this year's group was so large, it was more of a challenge for "bonding" to take place among participants.

She said it's becoming more difficult because the survivor generation is dying off. It still remains an open question, at least to her, whether 20 years from now the message about the Holocaust will be carried by the next generations.

"I hope so," she said.

At a wrap-up session for Toronto participants, co-ordinator Michael Soberman told the group it took him awhile to realize that the March can only serve, most fundamentally, as a tool "to instil a sense of community.

"Our only goal can be to light that spark that exists in every Jew," he said.

Meridor leaving JAFI

The chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) is stepping down. Sallai Meridor, who has headed JAFI since 1999, told Prime Minister Ariel Sharon he will step down early, effective June. An acting chairman will be elected at a JAFI board of governors meeting at that time.

Rockets fired from Lebanon

The Israel Defence Forces said two rockets were fired from Lebanese territory into Israel last Thursday. No injuries or damages were reported. It was the fourth rocket attack from Lebanon into northern Israel in the past year. A day earlier, a rocket damaged a factory in the industrial zone of Shlomi, a town near the Lebanese border. There were no casualties.

In the name of the father

The daughter of missing Israeli airman Ron Arad won a military honour. Sgt. Yuval Arad, who is doing national service as a support staffer in an elite airborne unit, was among several dozen Israeli conscripts to receive citations for excellence from President Moshe Katsav and the army's chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon. Arad, who was a baby when her father bailed out of his crippled jet over Lebanon in 1986 and disappeared into captivity, had previously avoided publicity. Officials at the annual Independence Day event vowed to keep up their quest to find Ron Arad or his remains.

Mofaz won't raze homes

Israel's defence minister Shaul Mofaz came out against calls to demolish settler property after Israel leaves Gaza. "After we evacuate the settlers, we would have to maintain military forces, security guards and units to raze the houses in the middle of enemy territory, and there is no assurance that there wouldn't be terror attacks," Mofaz told Israel Radio. The Palestinian Authority wants the properties destroyed, and the Sharon government plans to do so. But senior Israeli officials have said they should be left intact, as Israel would be responsible for clearing the rubble, which could take months.

Israel's population 6.9M

Israel's population stands at 6.9 million. According to Central Bureau of Statistics figures published before Independence Day, 5.5 million Israelis are listed as Jews and the remaining 20 per cent of the population are Arabs. But the first category includes 300,000 immigrants from the former Soviet Union who are not Jewish under rabbinical law.

Israelis head to Gaza

On Independence Day, thousands of Israelis flocked to Gaza Strip settlements slated for evacuation. Settler officials said 50,000 people were in Gush Katif last Thursday. Among them was former diaspora affairs Minister Natan Sharansky, who resigned from cabinet to protest Israel's upcoming pullout from Gaza and the northern West Bank.

Long-awaited Holocaust monument opens in Berlin

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BERLIN — Taking yet another pivotal step in atoning for its wartime crimes against Jews, Germany last week officially opened its first national Holocaust monument.

The Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe, set on nearly five acres of prime real estate in the heart of Germany's capital, commemorates the genocide of six million Jews between 1939 and 1945.

Designed by New York architect Peter Eisenman, and covering 19,000 square metres, the equivalent of about two baseball fields, it consists of two elements: a sea of 2,711 grey concrete pillars and slabs that resembles nothing less than an immense graveyard and an underground information and educational centre.

Only a short distance from the Reichstag, the German Parliament, and the Brandenburg Gate, the symbol of Berlin, the memorial imparts a sense of distress and isolation. It is about 100 metres away from the bunker where Adolf Hitler, the leader of the Third Reich, hunkered down in the last days of World War II and committed suicide.

It was inaugrated on a cool, sunny day at a sombre ceremony attended by, among other dignitaries, Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, Foreign Minister Joschke Fischer and leaders of Germany's reconstituted Jewish community.

Fifteen years in the making, the $35 million (US) memorial was plagued by delays over its location, design, cost and building materials. Approval for its construction, which began in 2003, was given by Reichstag deputies on June 25, 1999. The inauguration ceremony was held in a big white tent adjacent to the memorial and close to a street named after Hannah Arendt, the German-Jewish philosopher and author who was forced to flee Germany after the Nazi seizure of power in 1933.

Wolfgang Thierse, the speaker of Germany's parliament and an ardent advocate of the memorial, described the Holocaust as "the greatest crime in German history." Recalling that it was planned and administered in Berlin, he said it "touches the limits of our comprehension."

Thierse added that it exudes great emotional power, and will become an integral part of Germany's "cultural memory."

He thanked Eisenman for his "ingenious design," Yad Vashem for its cooperation and Holocaust survivors for their willingness to share their grief-stricken memories.

Paul Spiegel, the chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany and a survivor himself, said that German Jews were shamed, betrayed, tortured and murdered by their fellow citizens.

He praised the memorial as "artistically impressive." But in a relatively bold critique, he said it ignores the perpetrators and their fellow-travellers, as well as the other victims of the Holocaust. "It is an incomplete statement," he observed, noting that appropriate memorials should be built for victims such as gypsies and homosexuals.

In addition, he urged the federal government to maintain what he called "authentic memorial sites," or former concentrations camps such as Buchenwald and Ravensbruck.

In what appeared to be a reference to the resurgence of open hatred against Jews in Europe since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in 2000, Spiegel lamented, "We're still fighting anti-Semitism."

Calling it a momentous day for himself and Germany, Eisenman confessed that controversy and disagreements surrounded the building. But he expressed confidence that it will usher in a period of healthy debate about the nature of memorialization in Germany, which has paid out billions of dollars in reparations to Jews and Christians, encouraged the formation of a new Jewish community, the fastest-growing one in Europe, and formed a special bond and relationship with the state of Israel.

Striking a personal note, he said the project has drawn him closer to his Jewish roots. And then, to sustained applause, he concluded, "I'm a New Yorker, but part of my soul will always remain in Berlin."

Sabina van der Linden, a Polish Jew who was the sole member of her family to survive the Holocaust, said she knew only despair, humiliation, fear and hunger during her protracted ordeal. Now a citizen of Australia, she recalled the pogrom the German occupiers of her town unleashed and the help she received from a Christian neighbour who hid her after she was separated from her parents.

Since the end of the war, she has learned that hatred begets hatred, that silence in the face of racism is counterproductive and that the notion of collective guilt is fallacious. Quoting the novelist Elie Wiesel, she declared, "The children of killers are not killers." Her comments brought her a standing ovation.

Lea Rosh, the journalist and talk show host who originally pushed for the memorial, traced its genesis to a cathartic trip she made to former concentration camps in Poland in the 1980s. Rather than take credit for the concept herself, Rosh ascribed it to her colleague, the historian Eberhard Jaeckel. She also thanked Helmut Kohl, the former German chancellor, for supporting the project through thick and thin.

In closing, she remarked, "This memorial will stand in for the victims who have no graves."

At a concert of classical music the night before to mark the opening of the memorial, the mayor of Berlin, Klaus Wowereit, said he will do everything in his power to protect it from neo-Nazi vandalism.

Ironically, the steles are coated with a special anti-graffiti finish manufactured by Degussa, the German company that developed Zyklon-B, the deadly gas used by the Nazis at concentration camps.

EU warns Iran against resuming nuclear policies

"The question is when will they have sufficient knowledge [to build one], and we think that this possibility even exists, possibly, in another six to nine months."

Shalom also called on the International Atomic Energy Association to use its June 13 meeting to make a "clear and unequivocal decision" to bring the Iran issue before the United Nations Security Council, which he said "has the sole authority to impose sanctions on Iran."

France, Britain and Germany have warned Iran they will break off talks and join Washington in seeking UN Security Council action if Tehran makes good on its threats to resume atomic work, European Union officials said.

The foreign ministers of the European Union's three biggest powers sent a strongly worded letter to Hassan Rohani, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, warning that resuming potentially arms-related nuclear work "would bring the negotiating process to an end," an EU diplomat quoted the letter as saying.

"The consequences could only be negative for Iran," it said.

The head of Iran's nuclear agency said it may postpone resumption of uranium reprocessing after increasing European pressure.

"No certain day is fixed for resumption of reprocessing. It is possible to postpone it some days," Gholamreza Aghazadeh, the head of Iran's Atomic Organization, told the Tehran state-run television in a live roundtable discussion.

Israel Defence Forces chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, told Army Radio on Thursday that Israel knows how to protect itself against a potential Iranian threat.

"Iran is the central proponent of terrorism and Islamic fanaticism, and it has a non-conventional leadership that is liable to develop non-conventional weaponry," Ya'alon said. "Israel, therefore, needs to know how to defend itself against every threat and will always know how to do so."

Rohani said Tehran would resume some nuclear activities because it cannot continue nuclear negotiations with Europeans.

"Continuation of negotiations in their present format is not possible for us," he told state-run television, saying the talks were not balanced and were costly for Iran.

"The basic point that the Islamic Republic of Iran will resume part of its nuclear activities in the near future is definite."

British Prime Minister Tony Blair spelled out the potential consequences, telling reporters: "We certainly will support referral to the United Nations Security Council if Iran breaches its obligations and undertakings."

The United States believes Iran's nuclear energy program is a front to develop atomic weapons and has been pressing for Iran's case to be sent to the 15-member UN council for possible economic sanctions and other actions.

The EU shares U.S. suspicions but has offered incentives to try to get Tehran to give up its atomic fuel program, which Iran insists is only for nuclear power plants, not for arms.

French Foreign Minister Michel Barnier also urged Iran to maintain its voluntary freeze on enrichment-related activities.

"We continue to hope that Iran will not go ahead with this move, for which it is aware of the consequences," Barnier told the French Senate, the upper house of the country's Parliament.

The EU letter proposed "ministerial level talks" between the Iranians and Europeans within the next two weeks to break the impasse and avoid a crisis, EU diplomats said.

Hamas building army against PA: IDF chief

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Lieutenant General Moshe Ya'alon said "Hamas is building up an armed popular army against the Palestinian Authority.

"Its arming and gain of strength are rapid," Ya'alon told the foreign affairs and defence committee at a special farewell session held for him.

He said that "this is the ending of a long period of [military] service and the ending of over 10 years of appearing before the committee since I was military intelligence chief."

Ya'alon has often clashed with members of the foreign affairs and defence committee, notably with its chair Yuval Steinitz.

Steinitz, a Likud member of the Knesset, told Ya'alon: "We salute you and thank you for your contribution to Israel's security."

Singles flock to 'HEJ' parties' for fun and food

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

What began as a whim to throw a singles bash in the party room of a friend's condominium has turned into a word-of-mouth phenomenon known in Jewish circles as "HEJ parties" for the initials of their organizers.

Erin Toole, 32, known by her co-workers as the "social director," came up with the idea five years ago, but she didn't turn her vision into reality until two years later.

The success of her party exceeded everyone's expectations as 150 people showed up. Toole, who works in printing and graphic design, decided to begin an e-mail list to contact singles for future parties.

Eventually, said Toole, the parties fizzled out – until last fall, when she met Harris Pleet, a 38-year-old financial advisor.

"This pretty much started over gelato with me and Harris, when he decided to inform me that he makes the best lasagna, and I wanted to prove him wrong. I suggested we have a lasagna bake-off, and the parties grew from there," she said.

Toole got in touch with another friend, Jack Bensimon, 34, the chief financial officer for a software developer who lived in a condo with a party room. When a potluck dinner turned into a party with 24 singles, HEJ – short for Harris, Erin and Jack – parties were born.

Lesley Horlick, a friend who frequently attends HEJ parties, said Toole, who does most of the organizing work, deserves the credit for making the effort to bring people together.

"I hear people complaining about not being able to meet other Jewish people all the time, but there are so many ways to meet people here. Coming from Ottawa, I don't think people realize and appreciate the efforts people make here in Toronto," Horlick said.

"Everyone keeps telling me, 'Keep doing these parties. They're really great,'" Toole said. "Everyone says these are better than JDate parties [which are put together by the online Jewish singles network]."

"There aren't necessarily tons of hook-ups, but people always make new friends and always have a great time. I love planning and organizing events, it's a lot of fun," she added.

"Erin is a fantastic event and party planner," Horlick said. "I am amazed at the number of people she is able to bring out to these parties.

"The interesting thing is that Erin does not want this to be a paid type of event, so they are all free and everyone is always welcome to bring friends," she said.

If there is a cost – to rent a room, for example – Toole asks that guests bring a toonie to help cover it. But usually people who attend dinners and parties are encouraged to bring their own alcohol or something to eat.

Recently, Toole put together a barbecue at a friend's house that was open to anyone and their friends.

Right now, Toole is in the process of organizing a wine-tasting event and is hoping to reserve space at a restaurant on a Saturday night in June.

Regardless of how long Toole continues to plan social events for 100 of her closest friends, she said the parties are likely to live on.

"I've been an inspiration to others. A friend told me that the barbecue was so much fun that I've inspired her, and she's going to try to pull together a rooftop party for singles in early June," said Toole.

Toole, who will help spread the word since she has so many contacts, might join in the festivities.

Story of tragic romance set in Stalinist Moscow

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Russian Dance: A True Story of Intrigue and Passion in Stalinist Moscow*, by Andree Aelion Brooks (John Wiley & Sons.)

One evening in 1928, a Russian-Jewish physician and his wife, Marc and Katya Cheftel, attended a large and fancy dinner party at the Manhattan home of the renowned concert-hall impresario Max Rabinoff and his wife Bluet, who was equally known for her beauty, wit and charm.

Although Rabinoff had made a fortune as a capitalist by selling pianos and arranging musical events, he and Bluet were sympathetic to the ideals of Russian-style socialism and were captivated by their new visitor. Affiliated with the Red Cross, Cheftel explained that his mission in the United States was to study the American public health system. For the next two years, the Cheftels were frequent visitors to the elegant and always lively Rabinoff salon.

The slow-to-bloom love affair between Marc Cheftel and Bluet Rabinoff is the focus of Russian Dance, a recent book by American author Andree Aelion Brooks that skillfully relates the story of this tragic romance using a seamless blend of fictional and non-fictional narrative techniques.

It's a story well worth telling and Brooks tells it well, and with an apparently high degree of reliability, even as she blurs the traditional distinction between fiction and fact.

The story opens in the post-Lenin period, an era in which the Trotskyite and Stalinist factions struggled for political control of Russia. Brooks characterizes this historical moment, this calm between storms, as a "golden age of Bolshevism."

Naive as a schoolgirl, Bluet agrees to divorce her insensitive, womanizing husband and journey to Moscow to start a new life with Marc. Although she leaves her beloved teenaged daughter Anna behind, Bluet promises to send for her within a few months, as soon as she and Marc are happily settled.

Surprises lie in wait for each of the main players in this dark Russian plot. For Bluet, it's the discovery upon reaching Moscow that Marc is a senior operative in the GPU, the state political directorate, and had been functioning as a cunning spy in the United States; he has also failed to divorce his wife as promised. Blinded by love, Bluet moves into a shabby apartment with him.

For Max, it's the belated recognition that his showpiece wife and good friend have made him into a cuckold; for Anna, it's the traumatic realization that her mother doesn't want her to come to Moscow after all.

Marc's surprise is the realization that Russia's socialist dream, in which he was a true believer, has become a nightmare. After Stalin gains political control, the brutal collectivization of the Russian countryside that he initiates results in widespread starvation, deportations, deaths and suffering among the Russian masses.

Eventually Bluet realizes that her impoverished life in Moscow is a "living hell" from which escape is unlikely, since the authorities have confiscated her passport. Marc, having fallen out of favour with the regime because of his former ties to the Bolsheviks, begins to watch his back; his idealistic vigour seems to fade along with his optimism for the future of Russian socialism.

Ultimately, Bluet returns to Manhattan where she later became friends with Brooks; even so, it took her years before she would talk about her sad Russian misadventure. "I had already known Bluet for many years when she finally shared this story with me," the author relates. Bluet outlived her Russian paramour by more than 40 years and died in Manhattan in 1976 at the age of 85.

Brooks also spoke with Sheftel's sister-in-law and other knowledgeable sources to establish a compelling air of authenticity in the book.

Ride 'em Jewish Cowboy

"My Governor is a Jewish Cowboy," boasts Kinky Friedman's newest campaign bumper sticker.

Who else but the legendary Kinky Friedman could reinvent himself in yet another career with such aplomb? He first entered the race for Governor of Texas with some uncertainty with a large Jewish star as his logo and the message, "Kinky Friedman Governor 2006 'Why the Hell Not?'"

Text and photos by Beverley Abramson

Now that his campaign is officially launched, he has since changed his slogan and appears to be winning support from followers who consider him a refreshing change.

Kinky's early calling was in the Peace Corps following the path his family set as "professional do gooders", he says. Later, in the '70s he became an audacious country musician/singer and bandleader of Kinky Friedman & the Texas Jewboys.

When he found himself broke, he turned to writing out of desperation, establishing himself as a satirical humourist/performer; a prolific author of outrageous mystery novels (18 novels with four publishers); and a zany columnist for the Texas Monthly magazine.

Now, as an entrepreneur (selling coffee, salsa, olive oil, hats, and t-shirts) he donates proceeds to help maintain his Utopia Animal Rescue Ranch. This five- year-old animal shelter has been home to 600 dogs, a few pigs, donkeys, and wild animals such as a wild Russian boar and wild turkey.

He is also co-owner of Echo Hill Ranch summer camp, the first and only family-owned camp in Texas that serves the Jewish community while welcoming families from diverse cultural backgrounds. Both the Utopia Animal Rescue Ranch and overnight camp are adjacent to his home.

In his monthly column and speeches, Kinky frequently pays homage to his parents and sister, sharing his insight and feelings about their profound influence in shaping his values and commitment to social issues.

He describes himself as a blend of two cultures representing cowboys and Jewish – "both like to wear their hats indoors," he says. Having achieved many of his dreams and now, using his humour as a weapon, Kinky is claiming his spiritual calling. "Life smells good", he comments.

Kinky counts among his friends Willie Nelson and many other musicians as well as Bill Clinton and George W. and Laura Bush. Given his talent and track record for success he may be entertaining them soon in the Governor's mansion. Anything's possible. Might the next bumper sticker read, "My President is a Jewish Cowboy"? Washington get ready!

"Cowboy Country", her new exhibit about Texas cowboys runs at the Blue Dot Gallery, 55 Mill St. Building 47, Suite 101 until May 29.(416-487-1500).

Two tales of two cities told in three languages...

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

With a cast and crew of 60-plus people presenting two plays set in two cities and performed in three languages, Gesher Theatre's upcoming Toronto productions of City and Shosha are truly colossal endeavours.

"It's a major undertaking," says producer Robert Topol.

"But it's what I do and it's a lot of fun."

The Israel-based Gesher ensemble, lauded by the New York Times as one of the top theatre groups in the world, will take to the stage to perform Shosha on June 1 and 2 and City on June 4 and 5, at Toronto's Centre for the Arts.

Although both are set in pre-World War II Jewish eastern Europe, the plays present starkly different plots.

Shosha, which garnered a Nobel Prize for literature for its author, the iconic Isaac Bashevis Singer, is a love story that unfolds in the dark days of 1930s Warsaw.

City is an adaptation of Isaac Babel's stories exploring Odessa's bastion of dynamic Jewish culture, particularly its unique breed of Jewish gangsters.

Topol foresees the performances resonating strongly with audiences.

"If you've got a Jewish soul, you'll understand what [these plays] are all about," says Topol, formerly a major player at the multi-Tony award winning Livent Inc. and executive producer of the award winning documentaries, Deadly Currents and Impact of Terror.

"People will walk out of the theatre being very proud of who they are."

Born in the former Soviet republic of Georgia, Topol is married to Alla, a native of Odessa, and says the play's depiction of that city is the next best thing to being there.

"Culturally speaking, Odessa was hugely important for Jews," says Topol, noting Jews enjoyed freedoms in Odessa more than any other city in the Russian empire.

"It's a tremendous, amazing city and the next best thing to going to Odessa is coming to see City performed by Gesher."

Critics have given the play rave reviews.

To that end, the widely read newspaper the Guardian, based in England, characterized City as "Fiddler on the Roof meets Three Penny Opera."

Because Gesher's actors are Russian and Hebrew speaking, City and Shosha, respectively, will be performed in those languages, while the audience will tune in to headphones with simultaneous English translations.

Topol says he had a positive experience listening on a headphone when seeing Gesher on stage in New York a year ago.

"I myself was skeptical when I went to New York to see a play performed in Hebrew, but it was fantastic," he says.

"People will see this play and will be hugely entertained."

Topol says the extravaganza aspect of the productions marks somewhat of a turning point for Gesher, which was formed 14 years ago in Tel Aviv by immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

"Up to this point, most plays performed by Gesher have been done so in a theatre festival environment," he says, adding the group has dazzled audiences in such venues as London, Paris, New York, Moscow and Melbourne.

"This is a different kind of environment. It's the first time [for] a commercial engagement."

The productions are co-presented by Leslie and Anna Dan in association with the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

Topol explains that it was in fact Leslie Dan who approached him about producing the plays.

"I had never seen Gesher until last year in Europe," Topol recalls.

"Leslie felt it should be done in Toronto and a [mutual friend] told Leslie to give me a call... so he approached me and that's how I got involved."

In the run-up to the performances, Topol is in the midst of a marketing blitz, putting together flyers, posters and ads, as well as being personally interviewed for exposure in newspapers, magazines, television and radio.

"The biggest challenge is to market the show and spread the word," he says.

"We're building up to a crescendo now...I hope Toronto will come out and support it."

...and two plays by Israeli poet Yehuda Amichai

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Two plays about life, love and sex in Jerusalem written by the late Israeli poet Yehuda Amichai will debut in Toronto this month.

Amichai, best known for his poetry for which he was awarded the Israel Prize for poetry, the country's highest honour, also wrote two lesser known plays, To Love in Jerusalem, and The Day Martin Buber was Buried, that director Adam Seelig wants to share with the theatre-going public.

"Amichai is a very accessible poet. A large part of his appeal is that with the simplest words he can mean so much. It's simple, straightforward and it speaks directly to people," he says.

The plays – they will be staged as Two Radio Plays – will mark the Toronto launch of Seelig's theatre company, One Little Goat that originated in New York City four years ago.

"Amichai is one of the poets I was exposed to as a child. I lived in Jerusalem for a year. The reason why I founded the company was because I was interested in the intersection of theatre and modern poetry."

Seelig said that while he has been a fan of Amichai's poetry since he was a young boy, only recently did he stumble on his plays after doing some extensive research on the Internet about five years ago.

"As a poet, he's been close to me, but as a dramatist he's very new to me," he says.

"These plays are both quintessential Amichai works. He was a love poet. Both plays deal with love but have two distinctly different tones," he explains.

"The Day Martin Buber was Buried has a more sombre quality that is about lost love. To Love in Jerusalem is about a different kind of love, a passionate, torrid love affair where the couple makes love in different religious sites in Jerusalem."

The live performance features actors Pasha McKenley, who was named one of the top ten theatre actors in NOW Magazine, Kevin Hanchard, Paul Fanteaux, who was nominated twice for a Dora Award, Sean Dixon, Cayle Chernin and Dala Badr.

The other main player in this production is the authentic sound design taken from the city of Jerusalem itself, such as car horns, choirs, chants and church bells.

He says that both plays have a light, comedic quality to them, but one theme that is constant with both is the debate about whether a person has to be covered up to be religious.

In To Love in Jerusalem, says Seelig, there is a contrast of people being open with each other in an environment where people are encouraged to keep to themselves. But the play is written in a humorous way that, according to the director, is classically Amichai.

Though the plays deal with subjects that some people may find distasteful, such as fornicating in a shul, Seelig says it is not meant to be disrespectful.

"Amichai takes the dialogue of lovers and casts it in the rhythm of religious prayer," says Seelig.

"It's playful and it's paying homage to the spirit of religion."

And producing and directing these two plays by a man whose poetry had such on influence on him, is Seelig's way of paying homage to an international treasure.

"I wanted to show a side of one of the world's most beloved poets, to know Amichai as a dramatist, to open people's ears, to show people through sound there can be a deep emotional response. There's a thematic level of different kinds of love in Jerusalem, how love is interwoven into the city."

Two Radio Plays by Yehuda Amichai will premiere at the Al Green Theatre in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre on May 19, at 8 p.m.

HOLY BLOSSOM PRESENTS ARTHUR MILLER'S THE RIDE DOWN MOUNT MORGAN

Holy Blossom Temple Stagecraft Company marks its 10th anniversary with a production of the Arthur Miller play, The Ride Down Mount Morgan. The play tells the story of Lyman Felt, a middle-aged insurance executive with two wives, who has a near-fatal accident that brings his spouses face to face in the hospital.

"It's a very poignant story," says director Michael Ryval. "Miller deftly explores the nature of the lies and deceits that are often at the heart of many relationships. It's also a wonderful vehicle for actors and allows them to express a wide range of emotions."

Holy Blossom Temple, Eisendrath Auditorium. 1950 Bathurst St. $15-$10. May 26, 28 and 29, 8 p.m. 416-789-3291, ext. 511.

Teenage actor a master at playing troubled lads

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Michael Kanev, who plays the supporting role of Chester in the current theatrical film Saint Ralph, is a 15-year-old north-Toronto actor who's had a string of interesting and high-visibility parts since he entered the acting profession just over five years ago.

A student at Lawrence Park Collegiate where he recently finished Grade 10, Kanev has appeared in some 15 movies and television shows, including Elliott Smelliott, Samantha, I Downloaded A Ghost, Puppets Who Kill and the Berenstein Bears.

A master at playing troubled but brilliant lads and at putting on authentic-sounding Russian, South African, French and other accents, his on-screen persona ranges from the comic to the sinister, and often reflects a surprising level of complexity.

In Under the Dragon's Tail, a Canadian-produced television mystery, he played an artful-dodger type of servant who is murdered while stealing from his employer. "It was a good role," Kanev said. "I was this little punk, up to no good. It was quite a bit different than who I am in real life."

In Saint Ralph, which has been enjoying good box office around North America, he plays the best friend of a boy who is determined to run the 1959 Boston Marathon, believing a win might save his mother who is dying from cancer.

Kanev landed the part after five auditions. "My character – I really like him," he said. "He's a very bright boy and he wears big glasses. He's not a nerd but a good-hearted kid who wants the best for Ralph."

He's also done scores of TV commercials, some of which are still being aired. "He had two McDonalds, a Campbell's Soup, a Taco Bell, a Febreze — I can't remember all of them," said his mother, Mila.

Like the film and television productions, most of the commercials were shot in and around Toronto, where his parents arrived as immigrants from Kiev in the late '70s.

There's something about Kanev's red-haired looks and natural acting ability that have kept the talent scouts interested and the agents hopping. He seems blessed with natural acting abilities and a definite knack for learning parts and getting inside a character.

"When I do a role, I become familiar with the character. I'm not Michael, I'm whoever the character is," he said. "Especially when you're on the set, you're so focused, you just do your thing and the camera catches you and that's what happens."

Mila, herself an actor and singer, recalled that Michael always seemed determined to act. "I never wanted him to go into the business because I know how hard it is," she said. "But since he was three years old, he begged and pleaded with me, but I always said 'No.' So when he was 9½ or 10, he got himself an agent, all by himself."

Within two years of getting an agent he did 17 commercials, then began landing movie and television parts.

Although his involvement in Saint Ralph kept him out of school for nearly a month (he had a tutor on the set), Kanev is a hard-working student. This year he received 90-in drama and also did well in history and English. His father, Efim Kanev, is an engineer; his brother Nick an 18-year-old student in business school.

While he enjoys attending film premieres such as the New York opening of Samantha last November, he expressed doubt about whether he will pursue an acting career. "It's a really tough business," he said, with all the level-headedness of Chester from Saint Ralph. Still, that didn't stop him from going to Los Angeles to find an agent last November.

Meanwhile, he likes to play sports, listen to music and chill out with friends. He's also looking forward to going to Camp Northland this summer – if another acting part doesn't turn up first.

New Sephardi camp celebrates Zionist ideals

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

For several decades, sleepover camp has been a summertime ritual for legions of young Canadian Jews.

When school's out for summer, they perennially set off for beautiful, lakefront camp grounds to revel in up to two months of non-stop fun.

While this tradition is quite common amongst Ashkenazi Jews, it hasn't been as much so for the Sephardim. But that may very well change thanks to the start-up of Camp Torolago.

"There has never been a Sephardi-based overnight camp," said Rachel Benaim, 23, director of the overnight stream of Camp Torolago.

"So we felt, why not offer overnight camp for these kids?"

Situated on the banks of Bull and Bucks lakes in Arden, Ont., the 900-acre wonderland begins its second-ever camp season this summer.

A day stream of the camp for three to 13-year-olds will kick off its inaugural summer this year at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre in Thornhill, Ont.

Imbuing campers with Zionist ideals and a sense of Jewish camaraderie, the camps incorporate both Sephardi and Ashkenazi customs and traditions.

"On Shabbat, we sing Sephardi and Ashkenazi songs, so both groups can understand," said Benaim.

"The Sephardi spirit comes through naturally because the camp is Sephardi-run," said Leon Benlezrah, 23, director of the day camp.

"We don't have to go out of our way to be Sephardi because that's who we are."

In addition to the cultural component, the camp aims to provide campers with opportunities to explore nature and be active in sports and other exhilarating activities.

To that end, the overnight camp, for kids aged eight to 16, offers a variety of water activities, such as kayaking and water trampoline; land sports, including horseback riding and zip line; and various indoor activities, including video-arcade games.

Benlezrah, a teacher at She'arim Hebrew Day School, said campers at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre will make full use of the facility's gym and pool, outdoor basketball court and large field.

"Once a week, we'll have outings to places like Canada's Wonderland and Ontario Place," he said, adding the camp provides hot kosher lunches and door-to-door busing.

Annie Sugar sent her two sons and a daughter to the overnight camp last year and has signed them up to return this summer.

"It's like one big family," she said. "Everybody knows everybody."

Sugar said that this family dynamic was imperative for her seven-year-old daughter who had never previously spent a summer away from her parents.

"My daughter has long hair and they washed her hair for her," she said. "That's the kind of attention they give."

Sugar added that at other overnight camps, her kids didn't have as much time to do the activities they love because of the large camp size.

"They only got to go water-skiing once a week, whereas at Torolago, they went every day," she said.

Benaim, an aspiring teacher, noted the camp aims to foster a pattern of campers returning year after year, much like the tradition at Ashkenazi camps.

"The idea is that the kids will be together all these years," she said.

"It will keep the community together and let it grow and flourish… And it's also a place where kids can create lifelong friendships."

While not strictly religious, the overnight camp offers prayer services each morning for those who want to participate.

In line with the Zionist mandate, the camp will welcome 18 kids from Israel this summer, all of whom are victims of war.

"This will bring the face of Israel to these kids," said Benaim.

"It makes our Zionist philosophy real."

For campers who are nearing the age to be staff members, there is a special training initiative called the Torolago Leadership Program (TLP), which involves campers volunteering as assistants to counsellors, as well as taking part in workshops and seminars.

Campers at the overnight camp hail from different parts of Canada, as well as the United States, Venezuela and Mexico.

Benaim and Benlezrah noted there are subsidies available for parents who want to send their children to Torolago, but face financial and other obstacles.

"We're excited to add new things and bring new people to our camp community," said Benlezrah.

For more information, contact 905-731-5438 or visit www.torolago.com.

Lots of squash potential in Shoihet household

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Earle Shoihet believes there could very well be another squash champion in the family sometime down the road.

For the time being, though, the father of four boys is content to bask in the glory of son Albert's under-13 national title.

The country's top-ranked player in his age group captured the Canadian Junior Open Squash Championship at the Calgary Winter Club earlier this month, defeating third-seeded Adam Engel from Pickering, 9-7, 9-5, 10-8. He took home the national crown less than two months after winning the provincial championship at Niagara-on-the-Lake.

With brothers Ethan, 7, and Caleb, 10, showing plenty of potential, a sibling rivalry may be brewing in the Shoihet household as the boys grow older and continue to develop. Ethan finished third at a recent event held at the Toronto Lawn and Tennis Club, playing against kids three years older than himself.

The eldest Shoihet, 15-year-old Jacob, also plays squash, but is more interested in football and music.

"Ethan's really keen and getting better," said Albert, 12. "I think he's going to be a champion. I play with him once a week. He really enjoys it."

Albert Shoihet

Albert, who took up the game five years ago, won his second open provincial title in three years in March. He was sidelined for three months in 2004 with knee troubles related to a growth spurt, missing both the provincial and national championships.

He said the knee problem is under control while he continues to receive treatment from a chiropractor, as well as regular massages.

He's also become much more focused on squash, quitting hockey last November after playing four years at the triple-A level with the Vaughan Kings.

A member of the Fabulous Fitness club in Woodbridge, Albert finished third last year in both the Canadian and U.S. Opens and hopes to travel abroad next season to participate in the British Open.

This year's success can be partially attributed to hooking up for lessons with Mike Way, coach of Canada's top two players, Jonathon Power and Graham Ryding.

"[Albert's] a very good athlete and he's got a very good work ethic," Way said. "He does look like Graham Ryding did, a top junior player in his age group as well.

"Of course, there's a long way to go to develop a young player to play at the top professional level. If he stays the course, I don't see any reason why he couldn't make it to the same level as Graham.

"Graham's a very tenacious player and I see a very similar mindset in Albert."

The 5-2, 100-pound all-around player has remained atop the national rankings since the beginning of the year, and he plans to work out over the summer to stay in shape for the start of the new season in October.

A Grade 7 student at Oakville's WH Morden Public School, Albert also credits his success to mom "really pushing me to train a lot."

Over the next few months, he plans to attend three of Way's week-long squash camps while preparing for his bar mitzvah this fall.

Israeli hoops star teaches kids how to dribble and pass

By COOKIE LOMMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — Aulcie Perry is a tall man – and a man who stands tall in Israel.

At 6-11, the former professional basketball centre would stand out in a crowd anywhere in the world. In Israel, Perry draws crowds of cheering fans, especially youngsters.

"I've been here a long time," said Perry, an African-American born in Newark. "Israel has been very good to me."

Perry has been very good to Israel as well. After a successful career with the country's top basketball team, Maccabi Tel Aviv, Perry, 54, now operates summer basketball clinics for children aged seven to 14 in Israel – and as worldwide attention focuses on the NBA playoffs, he's about to open another one.

Along with Jewish sports heroes such as Tal Brody and Tamir Goodman, Perry is introducing a three-week sports camp called Sal Stars, or Hoop Stars in English translation.

Sal Stars will teach not only basketball but some tennis and soccer as well, Perry said. The program is open to Jewish kids from around the world, though it's aimed at Torah-observant Jewish teens.

The camp will be based in Givat Washington, a religious sports university near Ashdod. Givat Washington has world-renowned sports facilities, some of Israel's best athletic trainers and excellent accommodations.

"The three-week camp will give them the highest quality of coaching and training in sports as well as giving them the Israeli experience," Perry said. "We get a lot of kids from abroad. A lot of Jewish families that are working abroad send their kids to the camp to introduce them to Israel. They'll travel. They'll see the country, the historic sites. It's going to be something special."

The clinic runs from July 7 to 28. Participants also will spend time touring desert springs, ancient tunnels, rolling hills and beaches, Perry said.

Eight years ago, Perry and Greg Cornelius, an American from East Carolina University who played professionally in Israel, set up the Netanya camp.

"It is a very, very high quality affair," Perry said. "I bring the best coaches, and also coaches who are Israeli and were star players here in Israel. I also bring in the top players from Maccabi to come in and talk to the kids."

Perry came to Israel in 1976 as a rejected NBA player who was trying to work on his game on a summer league team. He impressed representatives from Maccabi Tel Aviv.

"I came… to work on my game and then go back and try again with the NBA," Perry said.

"Maccabi came to me. I signed up for two months. We won the European Cup.

"Things never looked the same again. Maccabi has been the top team since," he said.

Brody, from Trenton, N.J., was a star player in the United States. A college All-American in the 1960s, he was drafted as a top player in the NBA draft, but instead chose to come to Israel.

"Tal Brody is 'Mr. Basketball' in Israel," Perry said. "He changed basketball here."

Perry and Brody, who was the team captain, helped Maccabi Tel Aviv win the European championship in 1977, Perry's first year in Israeli basketball. The win put Maccabi "on the map to stay," Brody once said.

During his career, Perry also led Maccabi to victory in the 1981 European Cup, the 1980 Intercontinental Cup, nine league championships and eight National Cups.

When Perry was with Maccabi, he would bring traffic to a halt as fans jockeyed for a view of a man who, then-Prime Minister Menachem Begin said, helped bring "honour to the people of Israel."

Perry played high school ball at West Side High in Newark and college ball for Bethune-Cookman College in Daytona Beach, Fla. In 1975, he had a short stint with the Virginia Squires of the old American Basketball Association.

But it was in Israel that Perry found his game and his home, he said. Today, Perry, who is unmarried and has a son who's 28, observes Jewish holidays, but said in an e-mail that he "doesn't like to classify" himself religiously.

"In Israel, they are more concerned about what you can do than what colour your skin is," Perry said.

"You'll have the opportunity if you're capable and have something to offer."

AVOCADO & GRAPEFRUIT SALAD W/POMEGRANATES & PISTACHIOS

- 1 red onion, sliced into thin rounds
- 2 tbl white wine vinegar
- 1 bunch watercress
- 1 small pomegranate
- 3 red grapefruits
- 2 kiwifruit
- 1 lg. avocado
- grated zest & juice of 1 orange
- sea salt & freshly ground black pepper
- 2 tbl olive oil
- 1/4 c pistaschio nuts, coarsely chopped

1. Toss onion rings with vinegar; set aside in refrigerator. Rinse and dry watercress; wrap in paper towel; refrigerate.
2. Cut pomegranate into 1/4's; break out 1/2 c. of seeds. Working in the sink, gently squeeze 1 tbl of juice from the remaining pomegranate and set aside. Peel and section grapefruits. Peel, thinly slice kiwi. Peel and cut avocados into chunks.
3. Dressing: combine zest, orange juice, 1 tbl pomegranate juice, 1/4 tsp. salt; whisk in oil.
4. Arrange watercress on a plate; top with grapefruit sections (minus the juice). Add kiwi, avocado, and onions; pour dressing over all. Season with pepper; garnish with pistachio nuts. Serves 6.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

Accepting personal responsibly for one's actions is one of the fundamental precepts of Judaism. "Man is always liable" for damages caused, the Talmud declares even if such damages were caused while sleeping. This concept applies equally to damages caused by our possessions. Thus, owners of animals are liable for damages inflicted by their pets, the details of which take up much talmudic discussion. What was true regarding animals in talmudic times is equally true today regarding cars, computers or corporate assets. You are responsible for ensuring your e-mails are virus free. Conversely, a parent cannot be held liable for damages caused by their minor child, since a child is not owned by the parent.

Jewish law therefore does not accept the notion that workers' negligence should be borne by the employer. In a well known talmudic passage, a group of needy workers who broke a valuable barrel of wine were to pay out of pocket the total amount of the damages less any wages they were otherwise entitled to. Only the talmudic sage Rav's insistence that the employer, a rabbinic scholar himself, act beyond the letter of the law, freed the indigent workers of their liability and also allowed them to collect their salaries. But such demands are not necessarily placed on an average employer, nor given to workers who are not classified as poor. Thus, a worker who carelessly erases important computer files, or whose rude demeanour chases away clients, is to be held responsible for losses incurred.

Yet, while we must ensure that people take their responsibilities seriously, Jewish law recognizes that being excessively harsh on those who commit errors will scare away people from taking on more difficult tasks. It benefits nobody if fear of making a mistake rules the workplace. Thus, as a practical measure a worker who causes a financial loss is to take an oath that they were not negligent, thereby exempting themselves from payment. This rabbinic willingness to enact – and even change – laws to promote business growth is a common feature of Jewish civil law. Whereas, for example, Torah law requires a creditor to produce two witnesses (who must then be cross-examined) in order to collect monies owing, the talmudic sages relaxed the standards of evidence required in order to ensure that creditors would continue to loan money.

Dinner with an Eskimo

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

A short while ago, I had dinner with an Eskimo, a Canadian Inuit. She showed me how Eskimos rub noses.

My hostess told me fanciful stories about growing up in the cold North and her memories of building igloos with her father, then huddling inside them, cozy under caribou covers. She reminisced about their long sleigh rides and the sensitivity and respect they displayed for their captured hunt.

From time to time, my friend and her husband travel to Nunavut to visit her parents, and they have a grand time with them, despite the fact her parents can't speak a word of English and her husband doesn't speak a word of Inuit. Her stories were genuinely Canadian!

But the conversation then became sombre, as it often does with aboriginal folk. My companion lowered her eyes as she began recalling the days when RCMP police shot Inuit dogs, so as to stifle the natives' means of transportation and force them into villages.

She also recalled how she was snatched from her parents and taken to a residential school 1,000 miles away. She was six. How lonely and afraid she must have been. There, she was forbidden to speak her language or practise her culture. Instead, she was force-fed Christianity and encouraged to convert. Cases of sexual and physical abuse in those schools were the norm.

My Eskimo sister shared with me dreadful tales from her elders, including stories about the British Crown's practice – in the mid-1800s – of trading to native people blankets that had previously been used for smallpox victims in British Columbia. This, it is said, might be the first deliberate act of biological warfare against a people.

As I have researched my recent columns on Canada's indigenous inhabitants, I have become incensed at this aspect of my nation's history, and I feel overwhelming guilt at my lack of action on behalf of people whom we systematically murdered and crushed. The more I read about the institutionalized kidnapping, as well as the physical, mental and sexual abuse perpetrated against them – including the actions of our army a few short years ago in Oka, Que., to restrain Mohawks fighting the development of a golf course on land they claimed was sacred – the more deeply saddened I am about our Canadian roots.

What have we done? How did we Canadians allow and perform such acts of cruelty against beautiful little children? Are we not the globe's peacekeepers, trying to bring civility and harmony to international squabbles? I abhor the fact that I am now forced to accept the noxious reality that there is some real nastiness in my Canadian blood.

The Torah states: "You shall love your neighbour as yourself" (Leviticus 19:18). Rabbi Joseph Herman Hertz, the late chief rabbi of England, and other Torah authorities state that "neighbour" means people of any race or creed. This view is in sync with Rabbi Pinchas Eliyahu of Vilna, who encouraged love of all humankind, saying that "all people are created in the Divine image, and all engaged in improving civilization." Certainly, Canada's native peoples, then and now, are our neighbours – or perhaps we are theirs.

In a blip of time, Canadians have wounded, and continue to wound, many, many native people. A courageous message, therefore, desperately and quickly needs to flow from our lips to the ears of aboriginal people, "Selach lanu. Selach lanu. Selach lanu – Forgive us. Forgive us. Forgive us and offer us the chance to rebuild together, for the sake of what is just and for peace."

Imagine. I had dinner with a real Eskimo, a Canadian sister, and we rubbed noses.

"And none shall make them afraid." (Isaiah)

Upper Thornhill Estates offers quality in a rustic setting

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Rivermill Homes is proudly planning its next subdivision of quality homes nestled in a rustic area that's rich in natural beauty: Upper Thornhill Estates.

Partners Jeffery Katzman, Yoram Greenblatt and Paul Dasilva are building what will be the final group of homes to be made available in this choice area.

Located on Bathurst Street north of Major Mackenzie Drive, they promise to be yet another success from the builders who have to date built in Thornhill Woods, Mississauga, Brampton and Toronto.

Personal attention to detail, both during construction and after a sale, is a tradition at Rivermill Homes.

Katzman explains: "We're a small, on-site builder. We will customize the homes, always taking care of things. Quality is very important to us, and our standards are very high.

"We provide excellent value without compromising quality."

The company can customize its homes very easily, he says.

One plan, for instance, can accommodate two kitchens, and if a request is made before construction begins, there's usually no charge for such things as enlarging a washroom or moving a closet.

"We will make those changes, and our salespeople can read plans and help the purchasers," Katzman adds.

"We also have a designer that will go through the colour choices when it's time."

Only 40 detached homes on 42-foot- and 50-foot-wide lots are available in phase I. Buyers can choose from two-storey houses or bungalows, which are perfect for second- or third-time home buyers.

As a standard feature, only quality hardwood oak plank flooring is used in the homes' living rooms, dining rooms, family rooms and (where applicable) dens.

This is complemented by oak stairs, as well as by beautiful kitchens with breakfast bars and raised cabinets that stretch up toward the homes' high ceilings.

As well, 50-oz. carpet runners on stairs provide more comfort underfoot.

Some of the lots are on ravines and boast lower level walkouts. As well, a new Jewish community centre will also be built nearby at Bathurst and Weldrick Avenue.

And with lots of nearby conservation areas, walkways and nature trails, you could very well have a natural paradise in your own backyard.

"It's in a prestigious subdivision that's been architecturally controlled for the overall landscape," notes Katzman.

Minor repairs can prevent major problems

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Have you ever ignored a leaky faucet or dismissed a chipped tile and then regretted your indifference later on?

If so, you likely learned the hard way that dealing with a home maintenance issue head on can help prevent a minor issue from festering into a full-blown problem, says John Ullman of Dear John (416-704-6340 or www.dearjohn.ca).

"The biggest tip is if something looks like it's wearing out, it's better to call somebody in to take a look at it before it's broken, so you can try to salvage what you've got," says Ullman.

"If you wait too long, you've got no choice."

Since his childhood, when Ullman tagged alongside his contractor father to lend a hand, to the present, the full-time handyman has plied his trade for a host of customers, working on everything from plumbing and drywall to painting and electrical upkeeps.

"I do just about every repair or upgrade that goes on inside the home," he says.

Ullman believes a good handyman isn't merely someone who fixes or repairs your home, but someone who offers a personal touch.

"At the end of the day, I want the customer to feel that I'm more than just a guy trying to make a buck," he says.

"For instance, I have this one customer, a woman who is an elderly widow, where it's guaranteed that I will spend 20 minutes having a cup of coffee with her."

While Ullman is versatile, he notes there are certain jobs which require licensed professionals and is always ready to refer customers to those experts, if need be.

Serge Roytman of S.B. Electrical Service (416-834-4312) has 15 years of experience and recommends checking to see if the electrician you hire is licensed and has liability insurance.

"Electricity is very dangerous... and if it's not done by a professional, it can create trouble," he says.

"If the contractor is licensed, they should have a... license that's approved by the city and liability insurance."

'Electricity is very dangerous... and if it's not done by a professional, it can create trouble'

Roytman specializes in lighting systems, engaging in service upgrades in homes for such things as tube changes and pot lights.

Because many people are adding electrical appliances in their homes, Roytman says a burgeoning part of his business is adding amperage.

"If you want to rent a unit downstairs in the basement and you need to add a stove, microwave and fridge, you need more amperage in your house," he says.

"Increased amperage in your house gives you the opportunity to load your house with heavy [electrical] equipment."

In some instances, you may have the wherewithal to fix things on your own and just need to ask a professional a question or two. Roytman says that type of advice should be free.

"If they have any questions about electrical parts, they can call us and we will answer for free," he says.

Ullman has a similar philosophy.

"I look at my customers as not one-time customers," he relates.

"I'd like them to know they can count on me, even if it's to call me for advice."

Ullman urges customers to ask questions of their contractor and become educated on how and why something needs to be fixed or replaced.

"I'd want somebody that's going to come to my home not just to fix this and that, but who is going to advise me on what's happening and why," he says, noting this is a practice he employs.

"I like to try and educate my customers."

Century Grove Homes tranquil and convenient

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Picture a new suburban development with large detached homes nestled near parks and hiking trails. Imagine that this new community is so conveniently located it's just minutes from shopping, Go Transit, major highways, synagogues and Jewish day schools.

This new development, Upper Thornhill Estates, at the north-west corner of Major Mackenzie Drive and Bathurst Street, should have great appeal for those people wanting the best of two worlds: rural tranquillity and easy access to urban conveniences.

And there's good news for the savvy home buyer. Century Grove Homes (905-884-7848) is offering a selection of 13 models in the Upper Thornhill Estates development.

"Century Groves Homes is getting interest from a lot of repeat buyers. I know we have the best prices," says sales representative Irene Simons, a licensed real estate agent. "A lot of what may be upgrades for other builders are standard features for Century Grove Homes, like the silent floor and plywood sub floors."

She says the location and lot sizes are also key selling features. "It's a fabulous location. It will be very close to the new Jewish community campus.

"The bigger lots offer good value in lot size, location and design. Nature lovers won't have the congestion of too many houses built close together.

"They are all detached homes, which is very appealing for those buyers looking for a prestige community," Simons continues. "There are no town home, semis, apartments or condos. It's an area with appeal for every age group. You'll never have to move again."

Century Grove Homes is offering 13 models to choose from – two-storey homes and bungalows – ranging in size from 1,640 to 4,350 square feet, on 35- to 50-foot lots.

Prices starts at $389,990 for a 1,640-square-foot three-bedroom home. The largest home, 4,350 square feet, is selling for $714,990.

The biggest lots, which are 50 feet wide by 133 feet deep, are located on a premium court, Simons says, adding that some homes with walkout basements are still available.

"There's going to be lots of green space. There are 12 kilometres of hiking and walking trails, parks and open wetland. Some of it is maintained, some of it is naturalized. It's all part of the East Don River."

Century Groves Home builder Rob Vitullo says every one of these soon-to-be-constructed homes – scheduled to be completed by the end of 2006 – boasts nine-foot ceilings and family rooms with gas fireplaces on the first floor.

"The nine-foot ceilings on the main floor give the homes a luxurious feel," he says.

The largest models have nanny suites on the second floor complete with bathrooms and there's an option for a second-floor laundry room, he adds.

All the homes feature family rooms off the large kitchens. "A lot of kitchen upgrades are possible, says Vitullo. "We can do the upgrades in every house."

Other standard features include hardwood strip flooring on the main floor, oak staircases with runners, eat-in kitchens and master bedroom en suite bathrooms with corner tubs.

The kitchen cabinets are 39 inches high so there's more shelf space, he explains. "With nine-foot ceilings, the tall cabinets look better. Garberators and oak and maple cupboards are all standard features."

As for visual appeal, Vitullo says: "We wanted a lot of architectural detail like columns and wood mouldings. There are vinyl casement windows throughout except for the basement.

The bungalows will offer a condominium alternative to retirees wanting to downsize to one floor and maintain the privacy of a single-family home. This type of housing could also keep multiple generations of one family living in close proximity to each other, he says.

Simons adds that one of the advantages of buying a Century Grove Home is that it is listed with a realty company. "The beauty with us is that we can co-ordinate the sale of the old house to match the new house, because the company representing Century Grove, Premium One Realty Corp. is a full-service real estate brokerage."

Prices much lower than retail at auctions

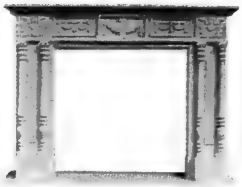
By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

"Going, going, gone!" The thrill of the auction lasts long after the gavel hits its mark, when items are taken to their new homes where they will be enjoyed for years to come.

Two long-established auction houses in Toronto are Empire and Waddington's.



The president of Empire Auctions (416-784-4261), Michael Rogozinsky, is enthusiastic about his family's business. Established by his father, the company now boasts additional branches in Montreal and Ottawa.

"Everybody in our family loves what we do. We treat our business as a passion, so we try to make it as fun as possible for ourselves and for our customers," Rogozinsky says. That is evident in Empire's approach to auctions.

"Our auctions are very user-friendly," he says. Empire's auctioneers speak in a clear, straightforward manner. Before the auction, viewings offer potential buyers the opportunity to examine the items and ask questions of the experts.

"In Canada, everything in auction is sold as is. At Empire, we want to maintain a strong reputation, so we do our best to describe things accurately," Rogozinsky says.

Some research may be needed to make an auction purchase, but the money saved makes the effort worthwhile. At auctions, one can purchase items available elsewhere for much less than retail.

Empire acquires its pieces from a variety of sources: estates, inheritances, importers, dealers, retailers, manufacturers and from people experiencing financial difficulties. Its collections include items unavailable anywhere else. Antiques, estate jewelry and watches, stamps, coins and European and American art are some of the treasures to be found. Even a Torah once passed through the doors of Empire, one which had been hidden during the war and was later restored and donated to a congregation that's using it today.

Rare sports memorabilia and sports cards are also available, as is rock memorabilia. An audiotape of an interview with John Lennon from a Montreal radio station was sold through Empire.

Waddington's (1-877-504-5700) was established in 1850 in downtown Toronto and had several owners before it was purchased by Ronald McLean in 1962. Today, it is operated by his three sons, Alistair, Donald and Duncan.

"We sell contents of homes, collections. We're very involved internationally working for vendors and buyers," Duncan McLean says.

Waddington's has 12 departments and experts knowledgeable in everything from dolls and maps to musical instruments.

The assorted collectibles at the auction house include jewelry, fine art, Oriental rugs, furniture, silver, pottery and chandeliers, as well as Royal Doulton figurines, books, Canadiana, ephemera (posters, letters, photographs), weaponry, African art and Judaica.

Waddington's will appraise items for insurance, estate planning or market-value-assessment purposes.

Waddington's has a branch in Vancouver, Joyner Waddington's Canadian Fine Art, which was formed through a merger of Joyner Fine Art Inc. and Waddington's. Joyner Waddington's Canadian Fine Art is one of the leading auction houses for Canadian art.

Judaica will be featured at Waddington's decorative arts auction on June 16. Many of the items are from the late 19th and early 20th century.

Dorion Liebgott, the curator of the Beth Tzedec museum, is involved in organizing the auction. "One of the goals is to encourage new collectors or people who don't want to spend a great deal necessarily but who want to start a collection," she says.

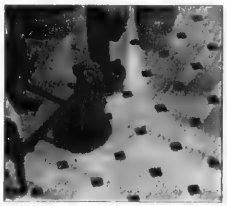
Spice containers in the shape of fish, flowers, towers or a ship are some of the more eclectic pieces to be auctioned. There are several large silver chanukiyot and a silver Iraqi kiddush cup with a tray and a lid. "It's quite interesting, the stuff that turns up," Liebgott says.

Hard or soft: choice of flooring requires some thought

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Like most big decisions you will make about your home, the secret to choosing excellent floors is solid research. Before you make a decision, there are a number of things that the experts recommend you consider, such as usage, location and care.

• What room is the flooring being installed in?



For busy rooms, you need a floor that can withstand years of heavy use, from the heavy pounding of children's sneakers to the scratches from Fido's uncut toenails and the occasional dropping of cutlery or china. Bathrooms and kitchens fall into this category. For rooms that only see slippered feet, a more delicate material may suffice.

Mitch Wolanski of Amcan Hardwood Floors (416-784-0064) has been installing hardwood floors for more than 30 years.

Although hardwood is popular in kitchens, he'd never recommend to a customer that they install it there. Dishwasher leaks, overflowing sinks, flying cooking oil and spilled liquids from the fridge can warp the wooden slats, permanently damaging the floor.

"I would only recommend hardwood floors if a husband and wife don't use the kitchen except for microwaving," he says. "It always takes a horrendous beating."

• What style do you want?

The possibilities are almost endless.

If you have your heart set on hardwood flooring, there are a number of popular colours and woods to choose from. White oak, Brazilian cherry and maple are very popular, as are other exotic woods from South America and Africa.

Stains and finishes have also come a long way. It's possible to stain wood on site, and if done properly, the results can be stunning. But if the job is done poorly, the result is a blotchy finish. Wolanski recommends choosing a prestained wood, which ensures that the colour you want for your floors is the colour you are going to get, and the texture and grain turn out perfectly.

"With pre-finished wood, the finish is perfect," he says. "As smooth as a baby's bum."

• Consider climate.

If you're set on hardwood flooring, keep the moisture content in mind. Hardwood floors are installed at a set moisture content, and when the moisture is set higher or lower for a prolonged period of time, the result is flooring that will look different than what was originally installed. Increased moisture in the air can cause the wood to expand and warp. Dry air with less moisture can dry out the wood and make the floor contract. Wolanski's rule of thumb is that a three per cent increase in humidity will expand the floors by one per cent.

"The wood acts like a sponge and sucks the water out of the air," he says.

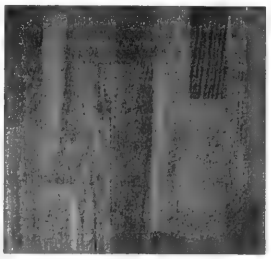
Regional climate will affect humidity, but so will a number of other things. Warm summer air, hot water radiators, big trees, leaking appliances, humidifiers and fireplaces can all change a floor's properties.

Yet, with proper care, hardwood can last for decades. Wolanski's house has hardwood flooring in every room but the hallways, kitchen and bathroom. He takes good care of the floor, only wears slippers at home, and has never had a problem.

However, not everyone wants wood. Rugs, especially high-quality ones, can be conversation pieces and function as art for your floors.

Ben Baum of Dominion Rug (416-485-9488) says the three types of rugs that are most common are Tibetan rugs, antique finish vegetable dye rugs, and aubusson rugs.

Tibetan rugs are handwoven in Nepal and made from wool and silk blends. The materials are soft, and the rugs come in a wide variety of patterns and colours, from traditional to modern designs.



Antique finish vegetable dye rugs have a washed out finish, with pale colours and traditional or Oriental designs. The vegetable dyes are natural and come in many colours. "They have a nice patina to them," Baum says.

Aubusson usually refers to a Louis XIV style or a French country look. The weave tends to be tight and flat, giving the rug a passing resemblance to a blanket.

Baum says there are two different ways to buy a rug.

If you fall in love with one before you have furniture, it's possible to use it as your starting point and build the room around it. However, most people try to find a rug to match a particular room.

Because it's impossible to picture how a rug will look in your living room while you're standing in a showroom – much less make a decision you will be happy with – most reputable rug dealers will allow you to leave a deposit and take a rug home, then return it if you decide a couple of days later that you don't like it.

Baum recommends taking advantage of this service.

"You have to see what it looks like with the colour of your furniture and walls," he says.

(A personal anecdote: my mother was looking for a rug for her family room, and she picked up and returned about a dozen rugs before she finally settled on one she liked.)

It's often heard that some rugs are made by children. If you want to avoid buying a rug that was made using child labour, look for a special label on the back, similar to the marking you would find on a piece of wool clothing, that indicates children weren't involved in the manufacturing process.

"Without that marking, there's no certainty that child labour isn't used," says Baum. A reputable rug dealer should be able to tell you which ones were made by adults only, he adds.

There's lots to consider when choosing lights

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Good lighting can make a room or house look inviting, and it can make the difference between a bright room that everybody loves using and a dim, cave-like dungeon that sits untouched.

But before you head off to install the newest, brightest lights in your basement, Michael Gladstone of Royal Lighting (416-782-1129) recommends that you consider the different types of lighting available, and your needs for each room.

Fluorescent lights have been around for ages and are fine for bedrooms and laundry rooms, but it's an uneven light that flickers slightly, which can irritate some people.

Halogen lights, known for their bright, white light, are popular choices for home offices, desk lamps, living rooms, and other rooms where you do a lot of reading. Good quality halogen lights burn brighter than other types of light bulbs and can also last longer than regular pot lights.

A kitchen is one of the most frequently used rooms in any house, and as such, it has specific lighting requirements. Gladstone says there should be a light or lights over the table, to brighten the area during mealtimes. Fluorescent light is fine for the preparation area, but choose something else for the eating area.

Bright lights are something that you can't afford to skimp on for a home office. Gladstone recommends getting a desk lamp, preferably one with a halogen bulb, and switching it on even if you think your work area is bright enough without it.

Track lighting – tiny lights artfully attached to rods and hanging from the ceiling – is also becoming a popular choice for home offices, he says.

The bathroom is where you prepare for the day ahead, so it's important that the counter or work area be well lit, and that the lighting mimic natural light as closely as possible.

Gladstone suggests installing bright vanity lights – a standard pot light will do if the bathroom is small, but if it's large, consider installing a fixture as well to minimize shadows. Frosted glass lights will also do the trick.

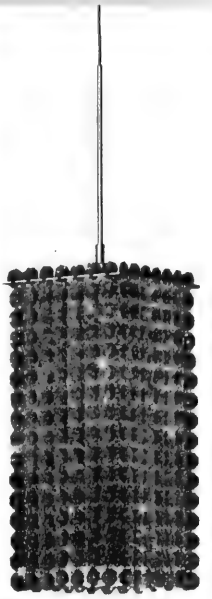
And if you want to install a light in the shower, make sure it's waterproof and moisture proof.

Significant details such as wattage and choosing the size of light fixtures usually depend on the size and colour of the room you are buying for, Gladstone says.

He will recommend different fixtures if a room has high ceilings instead of low ceilings, and if the walls are painted in dark colours instead of light colours.

Because lighting is so customized, he cautions that it's impossible to select a fixture or any other type of lighting without considering how it will look in the room, both in terms of function and esthetics.

For the environmentally conscious, lights that use up less energy are a wise choice for the pocketbook and the planet.



Choose halogen lights or energy-efficient curly fluorescent bulbs over standard or fluorescent pot lights. But keep in mind that once you install standard light fixtures, it can be difficult to convert them to more efficient varieties – it's possible with some, but with others, it just can't be done.

The big lighting trends this year are fixtures in earth tones and brushed nickel finishes, Gladstone says.

Polished brass is out, but he guesses that it will be popular again in a few years, because all styles make a comeback at some point.

But since lighting styles change every year, don't bother trying to make your fixtures look as up-to-the-minute as possible. Instead, Gladstone says your best bet is to put together a look that complements your furniture and the colour of your room. If done well, it will always look timeless.

Setting up a home office

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Working from home is not for the faint of heart – Philip Taylor knows from firsthand experience. He operates Mainly Mac (905-201-8460), which sells and services Apple computers, from his Markham home.

Taylor's garage has been converted into a service depot. Four full-time employees take over the bedrooms by day. Couriers come and go at all hours. ("I wonder what the neighbours think of that," he muses.) Work life and personal life are difficult to separate.

"It's very hard to run a home business," Taylor admits. But there's an upshot. "You have more control over how you do things."

Home businesses aren't ideal for everybody, but home offices are gaining in popularity. Whether you're working from home part-time, running a business from your basement, or just want a place to tinker on the computer in peace, there are a few things worth considering when it comes to outfitting your space.

• Computer

The differences between Macs and PCs are subtle, says Taylor. Generally speaking, Macs are better with graphic design programs such as Photoshop, while PCs are better for data processing and with accounting and finance software. The difference is in the way the machines "think" – PCs are linear thinkers and Macs are divergent thinkers. "The Mac interface appeals to the artistic element," he says.

For the casual user, the differences aren't a big deal. However, for first-time users, Macs are easier to learn on and understand, says Taylor. An added bonus: Macs aren't susceptible to viruses and are immune to spyware, an insidious program that traces your moves on the Internet, usually without your knowledge, and sends the information to a third party.

If and when something goes wrong with your computer, the problem is usually a result of viruses or spyware, says Kfir Fisher of Computer Clinic (416-570-1818). The best bet to keep your computer safe is to install antivirus software and update it frequently. Microsoft often provides free downloads to upgrade and maintain antivirus software, but Fisher laments that many people don't take advantage of the offers. "Do it," he urges. This can be the key to keeping your computer in good shape. Fisher occasionally runs into situations in which a six-year-old computer is in top condition, but a two-day-old computer is clogged with viruses because of the way the machine is being used.

• Internet access

Don't skimp on Internet access – get the fastest speed available, says Taylor. The last thing you want is to be waiting forever for an e-mail attachment to download, or worse yet, tying up the phone line while you're online.

• Printer

If you're going to be printing a lot of text, get a laser writer, says Taylor. They are expensive, but the ink can last for up to three years depending on the amount of printing you do. In contrast, an inkjet printer is cheaper than a laser printer, but the ink cartridges run out quickly and can be costly to replace, the quality can be better and it prints in colour – laser is black and white only.

• Fax machine

The fax machine is on the fast track to extinction, thanks to new computer technology, but for some lines of business, it's still an essential. There are still companies that require a hard copy of your signature and won't accept PDF documents. If you regularly read and sign legal documents, for example, you'll need a fax machine to send your John Hancock.

Dressing up the bedroom, bathroom and dining room

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Imagine the perfect evening. You're entertaining friends at home, then you retire to your personal oasis of comfort, your inviting bedroom. You can picture it, but do you have everything you need?

With an amazing selection and excellent service, David's Fine Linens, Provincial Table Pads and Deblins Linens are three retailers who can help you achieve your decorating goals.

Located in the elegant Bayview Village Shopping Centre, David's Fine Linens (416-590-7311) is known for dressing up dining rooms, bedrooms and bathrooms in the Greater Toronto Area with unique style. Manager Steven Back says: "We're a middle- to high-end linen boutique, with quality fabrics from everywhere in the world."

A member of the Canadian Interior Design Network, David's is the place to find that something special, and maybe a little bit different, for your home.

Its selection of table wear includes embroidered Irish linen, in patterns and textures that draw the eye. Often there are matching napkins that can be accented with napkin rings, also available at David's. One featured tablecloth at the store, in permanent press fabric, is washable with a soil-release finish. It's perfect for busy family get-togethers.

Beautiful towels offered at David's come with exquisite trims, including embroidery or pearl fastenings that can be removed for washing. Matching towels and robes are featured, too.

David's bedding includes sumptuous duvets and comforters, some of beautiful soft sateen fabrics. There is a full range of down products, including white goose-down duvets and pillows. A large selection of sheets made of Egyptian cotton is available. Egyptian cotton is "probably the best cotton you can get regardless of thread count," Back says.

Many of the products offered at the store are finished or produced locally, so custom work can be provided.

"If you're someone who appreciates the finer fabrics and workmanship, this is where you come," he says.

David's carries a full line of Tempur-Swedish products. Developed by NASA for the space program, the mattresses and pillows are made of heat- and pressure-sensitive material. Your body heat and weight mold the mattress, eliminating pressure points. The result is a very comfortable night's sleep.

Since 1982, Provincial Table Pads (1-905-383-1343) has been protecting finely crafted and cherished wood tables with protective coverings. Founded by Ross DePalma, it is the sole manufacturer of table pads in Canada.

DePalma says table pads provide an even surface for your table and stability for things prone to teetering, such as long-stemmed wineglasses. "They make your tablecloth hang a lot nicer," he says.

Provincial Table Pads protect your heirlooms

Table pads protect delicate surfaces from heat, scratches and spills. With pads, it's possible to place items that are as hot as as 500 F on the table.

"I've seen tables get marked with just a pizza box," says DePalma.

No place like an office at home

• Accountant

If you have a home business or work from home, a good accountant will help you determine what tax advantages you are eligible for. For many a small business, existence wouldn't be viable without significant tax breaks. "There is a lot of grey area on what you write off," says Taylor. "Tax deductions are the only way most small home businesses can survive."

A good accountant is worth more than his or her weight in gold and can save you more money than you pay for the accountant's fee. The accountant's fees may even be deductible, depending on your line of business.

• A room to put it in

An office is great, but some type of organizing system is necessary to prevent mounds of files from piling up on your desk.

Sal de Meglio of Regency Interiors (416-661-9100), a Toronto-based company that builds wall units, has noticed lately that customers are expressing more interest in having wall units built for home offices.

Most people who inquire about wall units for a home office are looking to fill entire walls – from floor to ceiling – with wall units. They're also looking for lots of room to store files and space for a computer. Shared workspaces are becoming popular, too. De Meglio recently built a unit with space for three workstations – one for each child. But most importantly, he notes, customers want a room with a pleasant, relaxing ambience that makes them want to sit down and do work.

To build a wall unit, de Meglio dispatches staff to take the measurements of a room to ensure a proper fit. Units can be built from a variety of materials, including exotic woods such as ebony or walnut, medium-density fibreboard with a satiny finish, and veneers. Fibreboard is a new addition to de Meglio's building stock, and is ideal because it is sturdy, doesn't twist or distort, and has a nice surface for finishes. Trims and designs can also be carved directly into fibreboard, and Regency can even match specific paint colours. The wall units, which are constructed in Regency's workshop, take about six to eight weeks to complete.

Linens in a variety of sizes and colours

Repeated spills won't cause pads to rot or to mildew, nor do the pads scratch the table. "I compare them to an insurance policy, if you want to enjoy your dinner and have peace of mind," says DePalma.

Available in a variety of colours, the table pads are guaranteed to fit. In-home service is offered and pads can be shipped anywhere. Provincial Table Pads also promises to beat any other price by five per cent.

The company can custom design pads for any surface in need of protection. Of late, they have been designing many pads for oak kitchen tables.

One grand piano in a concert hall in downtown Toronto was the recipient of a pad. During social functions, when the piano was not in use, people would rest their cocktails on it, marking the wood. Provincial Table Pads put an end to that.

The life span of the pads varies from 20 to 50 years, depending on how often they are used. And, of course, they also lengthen the life span of your table. The company can also provide protective bags for storing table leafs.

Deblins (416-782-2910) is a linen store with a vast selection at excellent prices, and is a recent recipient of the Consumer's Choice Award for Business Excellence.

Ellis Chitiz, Deblins' president, says: "All of our product is off price. Nothing in our store is ever regular price. I work on a smaller margin."

With complete lines for the bedroom, bathroom and dining room, including accessories, Deblins' prices may be low but its product quality is high. "We reject more than we buy," says Chitiz. "If it's not good enough for Deblins, we don't buy it."

Printed and jacquard towels are available in eight complete ranges of solid colours. They carry more than 100 shower curtains.

"We literally source household linens from all over the world to bring value and creativity to your home," says Chitiz, naming Israel, Italy, the United States, Germany, India, China and Canada as sources for Deblins' fine selection.

"On our sheets, we guarantee you won't have nightmares," he jokes.

Deblins offers sheets and accessories with a vast range of thread count, from 200 to 600, and cotton ticking with a high thread-count covers duvets and pillows, so the down doesn't escape. Brand-name and designer bedding includes seven new bedding designs from Israel, exclusive to Deblins.

Charlemagne, Deblins' house brand, is made to meet Deblins' specifications. Its logo is a castle, fitting for the linen store that helps make your home your castle.

Fun, fresh lime greens, pinks and aquas are currently being shown in bedding, bath and table linen. Dining rooms can benefit from Deblins' chair covers, tablecloths and napkins.

Also featured at Deblins is a virtual treasure-trove of specialty items for the home, including bathroom scales, large wall mirrors, bedside benches and iron beds.

The computerized bridal registry and gift cards make gift-giving easy, and through the registry, merchandise from any of Deblins' three locations can be accessed.

Mortgage Maven offers hope when things look hopeless

By SYLVIA BROOKE

Special to The CJN

Acquiring a mortgage is the most important financial part of buying a property, and Mortgage Maven (416-782-1195) is available to help when it seems there may be nowhere else to turn.

Gerald and Joel Kelman are the father-and-son duo behind Mortgage Maven – Gerald is secretary and treasurer and Joel is president.

"We're very involved in real estate," Gerald says. "My son is also a real estate broker, and I worked as a corporate tax advisor for many years."

The company specializes in equity-based lending. When a borrower doesn't qualify for institutional lending, the Kelmans do an appraisal and can arrange financing for up to 85 per cent of a property's current appraised value.

They're not concerned about tax returns or income, only that the borrower isn't a criminal and/or has never declared bankruptcy.

"It really helps out people if they're in a bind," Gerald says of Mortgage Maven's service, adding that "we haven't had any mortgage defaults in our experience."

They can set up a mortgage in a week from start to finish, including doing an appraisal, finding a lawyer, making adjustments and securing funding.

Their rates can vary, and most of the mortgages they set up are second mortgages – banks don't deal in second mortgages – although they have also set up some first ones.

Mortgage Maven works with brokers across Ontario, and is mostly involved with properties in urban areas such as Toronto, Barrie, Oshawa, Guelph and Cobourg.

However, the father and son have also been involved with financing a non-conventional mortgage on a property in cottage country.

If someone wants to get out of a mortgage, early payment is possible, and an equity loan can be used either to acquire a property or for personal needs, such as decorating, Gerald says.

The Kelmans will look at commercial ventures up to $25 million or arrange mortgages for as little as $20,000. As Gerald says, "We want to satisfy both sides, the borrower and the lender, and see that everyone's happy."

Enjoy a luxurious retreat and earn revenue

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

If you're seeking a place to retreat for the weekend and want to earn revenue in the process, then a hotel- style condominium suite in a resort is a tantalizing option, says Debbie Lafave, director of sales and marketing for Intrawest at Blue Mountain.

"It's a beautiful escape and you're only 90 minutes away from Toronto," Lafave says of the Westin Trillium House at Blue Mountain, the resort's flagship property.

Lafave explains that the rental program allows the owner of the suite to spend up to 120 nights a year using the facility, with the remainder of the time provided to rental guests. A percentage of the proceeds from the renters go to the owners.

"Owners get to see appreciation of their assets over the years, while offsetting the costs of ownership because revenues are coming in," she says.

"The owner takes a 50-50 split with Intrawest, so if we're not successful for the owner, we're not successful for ourselves."

On average, Lafave says owners spend about 30 nights a year on site.

She advises those who are in the market for this type of property to seek out one that meets their specific needs, both in terms of lifestyle and as an investment.

"Do I want to be using this regularly and will I come up in the winter to entertain?" Lafave cites as a question you should consider.

"If you've got three kids and a dog and you plan on being up at the resort almost every weekend, then I would say you're better off at one of our golf-course communities, with larger square footage and you're just a chip shot away from the village. It really depends on how much you want to use it."

The suites of the Westin Trillium House, three-quarters of which have been sold, include hotel-style perks.

A "heavenly" bed and bath and furniture amenities, as well as two-hour room service, a full restaurant and bar run by Oliver Bonacini and 10,000 square feet of conference space, are part of the package.

The newest project in the works is Mosaic.

"It's a trendy boutique hotel… where you can purchase a suite ranging from a bachelor up to a three bedroom," Lafave says.

"We've added a lot of creature comforts on site, like a spa and a spectacular pool with a fountain lit up with halogen lights that runs 24 hours."

Lafave adds that owners reap the benefits of Intrawest's marketing arsenal.

"Intrawest delivers a huge marketing package, attracting people for golf, skiing and conferences," she says.

"It's a very unique combination to find in a rental property."

While the rental program is popular, Lafave says some customers may be more inclined to not participate, seeking their own custom-built properties.

"We've seen an evolution in custom-built homes for people who don't want the rental program," she says.

"Some of these people are semi-retired and they want to extend their weekends. They stay in Toronto a few days a week and then come up [for the remainder]."

Security systems offer homeowners peace of mind

By SHERI SHEFA
Special to The CJN

When buying a new home, rewiring it for a home entertainment system shouldn't be your only priority, says security expert Jack Shore.

Shore, the president of Keystone Security Systems Inc., has been serving industrial and residential security needs in and around the Greater Toronto Area for the last 25 years.

While he installs a lot of commercial systems, residential security is also an important part of his business, and he offers complete home systems, including surveillance, intercoms, a fire system monitor, lighting and more.

"If the alarm goes off, it's nice to know that someone will be on their way," he said.

"It's a way for people to have peace of mind. If there is a home broken into, while you are on vacation or out for the day, someone will be dispatched and someone will be sent to the house to fix any damages, like a broken window."

But his company does more than fix windows after a break-in.

Keystone Security Systems also protects your home from fires, and Shore believes his company has the edge when it comes to fire monitoring.

"If an alarm goes off, the fire station will also be notified to prevent your house from burning down."

In addition to an alarm system, Shore recommends that if you're buying a new house or renovating, you should also consider installing a surveillance system to scare off potential burglars.

"A lot of people are looking at putting cameras around the house to deter intruders," said Shore, whose company specializes in surveillance, both covert and visible.

But home security is an investment, Shore said, noting that depending on the size of your house, a good system can cost several thousand dollars.

Perhaps one of the most comforting features that his company provides is an option for his customers to watch over their houses even when they are halfway around the world.

Shore said that all his customers need is a computer to be able to access their home cameras from the Internet to check up on their houses.

For more information, call Keystone Security Systems at 416-226-1161.

Good baby furniture is a solid investment

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special the The CJN

As all parents know, those little bundles of joy require a lot of equipment. Babies can't sleep on the floor, their clothes are too tiny to hang up in the closet, and they don't walk around by themselves for a few years.

But luckily, expectant parents have nine months to stock up on the necessities of baby life.

Since babies need a place to sleep, a crib is often the first purchase that new parents consider. It can seem like cribs come in more shapes, sizes and colours than adult beds – and indeed, the showroom of Kiddiesworld of Furniture in Mississauga (905-624-9092 or 416-621-9483) has more than 85 cribs on display, according to owner Jerry White.

And since children often sleep in a crib for up to three years, it's important to get a good mattress, White says.

Cribs that convert into beds that babies can use when they're older are also becoming popular, says Catherine Scott, owner of Dearborn Baby Express in Thornhill (905-881-3334).

"The style is completely different from how cribs used to be," Scott says.

The head and foot of the crib become the headboard and end of the larger bed, and the bed can be lowered closer to the ground for easier toddler access.

The convertible cribs sell in the same price range as traditional cribs, but while parents will need to buy a larger mattress and rails to hold the bed together, the cost is still less than buying a new bed outright.

"A lot of parents like them, because they don't have to buy anything else until the child gets married," she says.

Another baby essential is a car seat – hospitals won't let you leave for home without one, and with good reason, says Scott.

Babies will need two car seats – one for the newborn stage, and a larger one for when the baby is around six to eight months old.

New models are essentially carrying baskets that look like little chairs, and they snap into a holder buckled into the car. Many can also snap right into a stroller, so when your baby falls asleep in the car, there's no need to risk waking her up by transferring her to a traditional stroller.

Speaking of strollers, there are many different options, depending on your personal tastes. Three-wheeled jogging strollers – the equivalent of stroller SUVs – are becoming more popular, says Scott, but despite the healthy image they convey, they offer no real difference in safety or ease of use.

Many strollers have features such as easy folding, snap-in car seats, and rain covers. Whichever model you buy, make sure you can open, fold and lift it by yourself.

Another trend is dressers that double as change tables, says Scott, who has noticed that few people are buying stand-alone change tables anymore. This item is popular with new parents, because it has a life beyond the diaper years. The body has several drawers for storage purposes, and the flat top curves at its ends to fit a contoured change pad, which is available at baby stores.

A glider is also a practical piece of furniture, especially if a mother is nursing, White says.

Unlike a rocking chair, which rocks, a glider glides – as the name suggests – in a back-to-front motion, and it often has thick padding to sit on. The chair may also come with an ottoman that's also on gliders, so the adult's whole body moves in one smooth motion.

Many manufacturers also offer items that can be added to existing furniture sets once baby gets older.

Desks, night tables, and double beds are often designed so parents can keep elements of a baby's room even after the baby years have passed, and nobody will know they were once part of a nursery.

"A lot of people are getting more practical and seeing the added use, because things are expensive," Scott says.

Many children's desks are made with space for a computer and a pull-out tray for a keyboard, and can be used until the child grows too big to fit his or her knees under them, White adds.

There are a number of styles for baby's furniture this year.

There is also tremendous variety when it comes to colours. "The big colour for a child now, believe it or not, is black," says White, adding that saffron and weathered white are also popular choices.

But if you plan to keep a set and use it as the child grows, consider buying a neutral colour that won't embarrass your child when he or she is a teenager. (My parents bought me a white bedroom set when I was in elementary school, and 15 years later, it still serves its purpose well, although the desk is a bit too small now.)

Both White and Scott note that, regardless of what you buy, children's furniture is an investment that will be used for years – one that can be passed down to siblings, relatives or friends.

First-time home buyers must do their homework

By SHERI SHEFA
Special to The CJN

While buying a home for the first time can be exciting, there are many factors that need to be taken into account to make an informed decision.

According to some first-time buyers, the three most important factors to consider are location, location and location.

Bryan Demsky, who recently got married and bought a home, recalls the decision-making process that he and his wife went through before choosing the house that was right for them.

He said they considered what they could afford, whether they wanted to buy a new house or a resale home, whether they would buy a detached or a townhouse, and whether they would buy in a Jewish area.

"Once we decided that we would purchase new, it was only between Thornhill Woods [a budding Jewish community at Bathurst Street and Highway 7] and the area we eventually chose, Bathurst and Elgin Mills [Road]," Demsky said.

"Thornhill Woods became way too unreasonable with respect to pricing, given what we were getting. Even our area was quite high if you compared it to other areas surrounding Toronto, but that's the price you pay for being fairly central and in a Jewish or an in-demand area," he added.

Danielle Markus and her husband, also first-time buyers, felt that living in central Toronto was more important to them than anything else.

"We didn't want to be in a remote area without easy access to public transportation, shops and grocery stores," she said.

"When we found the home that we wanted to buy, we spoke to neighbours and researched the area. It was first about the house meeting our needs, over and above the location, but we got lucky. We were able to find a home in the Yonge [Street] and Sheppard [Avenue] area that had everything we were looking for," Markus added.

Most home buyers know that some times are better than others to buy, but in Demsky's case, he wanted to have a house waiting for him after his October wedding last year.

"Ideally, we wanted something to close immediately, but that wasn't an option. And by waiting the extra time, we were able to save a substantial amount of money each month," he said.

Markus also took the seasons into consideration.

"We thought that we might be able to find better prices and less bidding wars by buying in the winter," she said.

Despite being able to save a lot of money for a down payment, Demsky and his wife realized that they didn't have a lot of choices when it came to financing.

"[We opted for a] mortgage. No other options were considered. Ideally, we would have liked to pay in full with cash, but we didn't have that luxury."

The Markuses, on the other hand, decided on a non-traditional financial plan that worked better for them than a mortgage.

"We have a secured home equity line of credit combined with a checking account. We opted out of a traditional mortgage because the line of credit suited our particular needs better," Markus said.

Fact box: TIPS TO REMEMBER

- Know your agent. Make sure he or she is knowledgeable, experienced and loyal. Don't be afraid to interview two or three agents before deciding on one.
- Don't buy a house you can't afford. This seems like obvious advice, but if your monthly debts, including your mortgage, exceed more than 36 per cent of your income before taxes, you've gone overboard. You should always leave yourself enough money to live a full life – and to go on vacation once in a while.
- Pick the right mortgage, and don't be afraid to do all the necessary research to find the financial plan that's best for you.
- Get a pre-approval letter. This will let sellers see you as a serious buyer and will give you leverage when it comes to negotiating.
- Lock in your interest rate. This will protect you from an increase if rates go up while you're looking for your house.
- Don't let the seller know how much you love a house. They may feel they can hold out for the asking price.

Man and Mower – cut to the heart of personality

(NC)-It's no secret that you can tell a lot about a man by the car he drives.

Want proof? Picture the devoted family man and a sensible sedan or van comes to mind. Likewise, the style-conscience professional wouldn't be seen in anything but a high-performance sports car. And there's little doubt that the person tooling around in a hybrid electric vehicle feels strongly about the environment.

What's parked in the driveway also is a good indicator of what's stored in the garden shed, according to John DeFranco, The Home Depot Canada's buyer for outdoor power equipment.

"The same factors that influence the decision-making process when buying an automobile can be applied when selecting a new mower," said DeFranco. "When shopping for a new car, you compare the features, kick the tires and check under the hood, but in the end it's the one that best suits your personality that seals the deal."

Dream Machine

For those who dream of owning a Hummer and wouldn't drive anything but a 4-wheel-drive, John Deere tractors exceed even the toughest test. With plenty of power under the hood, cruise control, automatic transmission, a deluxe high-back seat and even a power port for plugging in a cell phone or CD player, these machines will keep the driver content for hours.

Cut to the Chase

The family man who prefers to drive a van or sedan wants a reliable mower that will complete the job quickly, since the yard is little more than a distraction from the busy rigors of home life.

"There's no question that this personality requires easy lawn maintenance," DeFranco said. He suggests an easy-starting, low-maintenance mower, designed for demanding residential mowing that leaving more time for a friendly chat with your neighbour.

The Manicurist

If the lure of European precision and high-performance sports cars fires you up, Toro mowers will take you where you want to go. This is the perfect mower for those who like exact cuts, precise edging and plenty of compliments from envious neighbours.

"There's no need to break a sweat with one of these mowers," said DeFranco. "The self-propelled system allows you to slow down or speed up effortlessly, something you'll appreciate on a hot day."

Mr. Down to Earth

For the sentimentalist or grounded environmentalist who sees green, a push reel or electric mower is the way to go. Neither type has an internal combustion engine. They are quieter and don't produce emissions like gas-powered mowers.

Battery-powered mowers are good for smaller yards and require little maintenance. Push reel mowers are simple machines with no power source, so you'll get a light cardiovascular workout while sprucing up your yard.

No matter what your personality type, DeFranco said, size up your landscaping needs before purchasing a new mower. Next, take a look in the driveway.

Room size important when buying furniture

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When it comes to shopping for home furniture, size is important.

"The very first advice I would give to people is to know the measurements of their living room, dining room, den, bedroom, etc.," says Mickey Zworth, president of 18th Century Furniture Galleries, which has been furnishing homes for more than a decade.

"Once we learn the sizes of the rooms, our staff will give free advice on how to furnish it."

Zworth notes that 18th Century staff have expertise in interior design and decoration and will go into a customer's home to develop tailor-made ideas for appropriate styles, colours and fittings.

"When we see the customers' homes and the actual rooms, we can come back to the store and advise them on exactly what they should get," says Zworth, a 50-year industry veteran.

Of course, advice is only valuable when the person providing it is well-informed. That's why it's important to shop at a store with staff who know their field.

"Somebody who is knowledgeable is the best candidate for good advice," says Joe Cabral, owner of Carrocel Restorations, a family business established 21 years ago.

Specializing in main floor furniture such as tables, chairs and classic accessory pieces, Carrocel sells, restores and builds furniture on site.

"We build custom tables... so when you're buying a table, you are getting selected grains, veneers and a proper finish," notes Cabral.

He encourages shoppers to buy from a store with a solid reputation.

"You have to be careful that you're buying from a reputable dealer who can provide service if there is a problem," he says.

To that end, Zworth says customer service is paramount. "We treat service the same as a sale," says Zworth, recalling an incident in which a customer's house guest damaged a couch and 18th Cenutry had it fixed, free of charge.

"It is so vital for a customer to be satisfied... because one satisfied customer means more customers for us."

Since furniture comes from all over the world, Cabral emphasizes the importance of buying pieces that are suited to our cold Canadian climate.

"One of the most important things people should get is furniture that is acclimatized for North America," Cabral says. "There is a lot of furniture that is from offshore... and once the furniture is here over the winter months when it is excessively dry [inside], the dryness is the worst thing for wood."

With respect to trends in style, Zworth sees a mixture between traditional and modern, which he terms transitional.

"People are looking for transitional furniture – half-modern, half-traditional – because they correlate," he says.

"If they have something in their home which is very personal, we work around the times... to coincide with the new furniture they are getting."

Cabral is unequivocally a traditional advocate. "One thing about traditional styles is that they are always in style," he says. "They are timeless."

18th Century Furniture Galleries is at 7855 Keele Street. To contact the store, phone 905-760-1518 or visit www.18thcenturyfurnituregalleries.com.

Lotus Condo unveils model suite

Lotus Condo, a project of ShiuPong Developments Ltd. offers a new concept in urban living – a private, hotel-inspired spa service in a condominium for the exclusive use of residents and their guests.

Located on Scollard Street at Yonge Street and Davenport Road, Lotus is Toronto's only condo plus spa, offering the perfect balance of chic urban living in the heart of Yorkville.

Spa amenities include yoga studio, gym, massage and treatment rooms, nail bar and steam rooms – hotel-style services right in your own building.

Michael Wilson of International Home Marketing says, "Our customers are sophisticated young professionals and active empty nesters who love the Yorkville location and lifestyle.

"They have been drawn to the well-designed layouts, superb Yorkville location and the great value."

Suites range from boutique studios to one-bedroom, one-bedroom-plus-den and two bedroom suites, as well as a penthouse collection.

In designing a two-bedroom model suite, interior design consultancy Moca Design was enlisted to create a warm and seductive atmosphere.

The 1,247-square-foot model suite has a two-bedroom, two-bathroom layout with curved glass and a dramatic elliptical layout.

"The building profile is mixed with stylish 30somethings and sophisticated 50-plus, so we created a model suite that is both classic and contemporary and appeals to both age groups," says Moca's Naji Mourani.

Expansive views radiate from the elliptical open concept living/dining area. A palette of creams, chocolate and espresso are used throughout, with dashes of colour provided by accessories. The tonal scheme and textured sheers unite each room for a co-ordinated, seamless flow.

The living/dining area opens to a curved wall of glass ideal for taking in the views of downtown and Yorkville. The balcony can be accessed from the living area as well as from the master bedroom.

The kitchen has a granite counter bar that is perfect for entertaining or casual eating. The stainless steel appliances, which are standard, are sleek and appealing.

In the master suite, the large upholstered headboard, oversized espresso coloured side tables, writing desk, his and hers closets and sumptuous ensuite are evocative of a stylish boutique hotel.

A large window/slider offers easy access to the balcony. The ensuite vanity has a modern glass countertop with raised glass bowl, single lever faucet, stylish soaker tub and marble flooring – these items are standard features at Lotus.

The main bath is more than a typical powder room. A three-sided glass shower enclosure and designer sink add style and great functionality.

Flexibility and functionality continue in the second bedroom. "We designed it to be a multi-tasking room," says Sandra Colavecchia of Moca Designs.

"The built-in day bed means the space can easily be used as a den or second bedroom. And the built-in work station is ideal for a home office."

"The overall look is serene and very calming, the perfect oasis in the city."

With suites starting at $179,900, "it's the best value in Yorkville. It's a great building at a great price in a great location," Wilson says.

For more information, call 416-968-1717, visit www.lotuscondo.com, or drop by the sales centre and model suite at 8 Scollard St., at the corner of Yonge and Davenport.

Turn your home into a movie theatre

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

From cinematic projector screens to dazzling neon lights, all the trappings of the movie theatre experience can now be comfortably provided to you in your home.

So to ensure you get the best bang for your buck when you seek out home entertainment products, the experts recommend doing some good old-fashioned research.

"Start out by doing some research on the Internet or in magazines," says Saul Keshen, president of Giant Screen Systems (416-784-4454 or www.giantscreensystems.com).

"Then it's best to actually take a look and listen to see what you will end up with."

The variety of products you can end up with seems to grow by the day.

Keshen, a 22-year industry veteran, says retractable projector screens are a particularly hot item.

"The best advancements in video quality have been made in that field," he says.

"The screen is retractable, so it doesn't take up too much space in a room... it's less expensive, has as good or better a picture than any other type... and if you want the home theatre experience, it's really close to what you would get by going out to the movie theatre."

While the screen is certainly central to the movie-like experience, there are many other amenities that meet this need.

"People are starting to put in theatre seating... neon lights, movie posters and even fake ticket booths," says Robert Campol, general manager of Synergy Home Systems (905-669-5005 or www.synergyhomesystems.com).

"It's become an event."

In addition to audiovisual entertainment, Synergy provides a gamut of home system services, including security, automated lighting and other touch panel controls that can do everything from turning on your furnace to operating motorized blinds.

Campol trumpets automated lighting as both an object of convenience and esthetics.

"I think the lighting control system is really the best thing I install these days," he says.

"The reason is that it does so much on an esthetic basis to make your home look more refined... making your furnishings and floor look their best all the time. And you don't have to run around turning on lights and lamps. You do it once, clock it into a preset and it's recalled immediately."

Because business is booming, customers have no shortage of choices, which can make selecting the right company a bit of a challenge.

That's why Campol and Keshen agree that reputation is important.

"Take a look at the experience and reputation of the dealer," advises Keshen.

"Look for someone who has what you need and the reputation to back it up."

Also, be sure that the store salesperson makes you aware of the sheer variety of products that are available.

"We educate our prospective clients on everything that is available [now] and new technologies that are around the corner, so they can make educated decisions as to what to put in their home now and to at least be prepared for the future," Keshen says.

To that end, Keshen emphasizes the need to have homes wired for the future, so that you'll be equipped for the newest technological innovations.

Interior decorator helps give your home a unique touch

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special The CJN

With people paying more attention to their homes than ever before, interior decoration is once again emerging as a booming and exciting industry, one that uses the season's hottest trends in fabric, shape and design.

Want to know how to get in on this growing trend but don't know just how to do it? There are many interior decorators that will do the job, but Stephanie Benaiche of SB Interiors (905-883- 4796) promises to give your home a unique touch that will last for years.

Growing up as the daughter of an architect, Benaiche developed her love for design into a passion for interior decor. She graduated from the Academy of Design with a diploma in interior decorating and has been the face of SB Interiors for four years.

SB Interiors will decorate any room in your home from the bathroom to the dining room with equal panache. Benaiche offers a unique one-on-one service and gives a personal assessment of your individual needs and wants, whether the company is doing an entire home makeover or just a little freshening up.

She takes everything into account, including your existing furniture and your budget, to create a look that is just right for you.

"I know how expensive things can get, so it's really important to me to find things that are within the client's budget," Benaiche says.

To create a unique look for each renovation, she creates several storyboards with possible choices of colour, fabric and furniture to choose from.

Benaiche also likes to keep some older pieces to mix in with the new look. "I don't like to replace furniture just for the sake of it," she says. "If certain pieces have always worked for you, then why throw them out?"

Benaiche believes personal pieces add a special character to rooms, but while creating a personal look for her clients is important, Benaiche understands interior decorating trends as well. She cites bright colours, antiques and eclecticism as the hottest trends now. Using different pieces to complement each other, for example, often creates the most uniquely cohesive of looks.

"People are really putting a lot more thought into decorating these days," she says. "Clients love to borrow from different periods within one room."

Although she enjoys all aspects of interior décor, what Benaiche likes most is the interaction with her clients. "I like knowing that at the end of the day, my clients will come home and be happy."

And she loves to decorate bedrooms, children's rooms and rooms that will be used on a day-to-day basis.

In such a fast-paced industry as interior decorating, the services of SB Interiors are quite unique. Benaiche makes it a point to listen to all her clients to make sure they will be pleased with the results. "A lot of designers do their own thing, but what works for one person doesn't necessarily work for everyone else," she says.

The process of redoing your home can be daunting, and it seems all too simple to get caught up in the newest, hottest looks. Hiring an interior decorator can help you home in on what you want and make sure you get there.

"Your home is your sanctuary, and you have to be comfortable in it," Benaiche says.

Kitchens are about more than storage

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Imagine a kitchen without cabinets. Impossible? Absolutely. Without a well-planned system to organize your kitchen, there would be no way to find the items you need when you need them.

Aside from the most common types of cabinets – doors that swing out to reveal rows of shelves inside – there are many different ways you can utilize your space.

According to staff at the showroom for Kitchen and Bath by Laurentide (416-850-2830), other popular types of cabinets include lazy Susans – round, rotating shelves usually placed in corner cabinets – and drawers called pantry pullouts that allow for maximum reach in deep cabinets.

But kitchen cabinetry can also be a hallmark of style, not just a storage system.

The materials used to build the doors, as well as the staining and the colouring, can help your cabinets make a statement.

When customers visit owner Mike Tuk at the showroom, one of the first things he or his staff usually ask about is the type and style of cabinet doors a customer is interested in.

Doors come in a wide variety of materials and colours. In recent months, customers have been opting for a glazed look, which is achieved through the use of paints, light washes or teaking. But traditional styles are still common.

The bottom line: cabinets last a long time, so make sure you choose a style you can live with, and with functionality that suits your needs.

As for kitchen countertops, Tuk says Laurentide specializes in natural materials, primarily granite, marble, corian and slate.

Granite is a hard stone, and the likelihood of finding something harder is small. Marble comes in a wider variety of colours than granite, but it's also a softer than granite, and as a result, it's more prone to nicks and scratches. Slate and limestone, also softer materials, are more common in vanity counters.

The question of how hard a stone is isn't an academic argument or a holdover from high school geography class. The kitchen is home to a number of sharp objects – such as knives, forks and bottle openers – and all it takes is a carving knife landing on a counter, blade side down, to chip the stone.

Regardless of the type of stone you choose, it's important to get it sealed. Without a sealant, a spill – from ketchup to hair dye – could stain the stone.

'Doors come in a variety of materials and colours'

As for maintenance, Tuk says, "There are solutions for cabinets to keep them shiny and new," but wiping down cabinets and countertops with a damp washcloth will also do the trick.

Laurentide will also take measurements of your kitchen and recommend appliances to fit your space and budget.

Logart Inc. (905-709-2722) manufactures kitchen counters, cabinets and bathroom vanities. Before redoing a kitchen, Logart dispatches staff to take measurements of your kitchen. The company can also take care of the plumbing, tiling and flooring. Logart also has interior designers on staff.

A gym under your own roof

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Some days, when it seems like the heavens are plotting to keep you away from the gym (translation: it's snowing and you don't want brush off the car) or you're not in the mood to put up with gym rats (read: you don't want to share the TV), nothing can seem more appealing than a treadmill under your own roof.

It's possible! But building a home gym, whether it's one cardio machine or a room bursting with weights and other fancy equipment, requires dedication, maintenance and a financial investment.

The first thing you need to do is evaluate your fitness goals and fitness needs, says Daniel Minniti of Fitness Depot (416-243-8888), a company that sells, delivers and repairs fitness equipment. What is it you hope to achieve with a home gym? Do you want to train for the Boston Marathon from the treadmill in your basement, or do you just want a set of free weights to do some casual weightlifting? Once you're sure you know what you want and need, it will be easier to narrow down the choices until you find something that suits you.

Once you know what piece of equipment you want, be sure to test it. A reputable store should let you try out that elliptical trainer right on the showroom floor. Make sure the machine you're interested in is a comfortable fit for your body size. There aren't any machines specifically designed for men or women only, but the sizes do vary and it's essential that your machine isn't too big or too small.

If it's a bike, how comfortable is the seat? Does it make your bum go numb? Can you adjust the height of the seat? Are the pedals too stiff, or are the handlebars too far to reach easily? If it's a treadmill, make sure the handlebars are comfortable to hold, and they're not too tall or too short for you – you shouldn't be slouching. Does the treadmill have a good shock absorber? Will you slip while running? If you like to use the preprogrammed workouts, do you like the ones that the machine offers?

Also, keep in mind that it's going to cost you money, says Minniti. The cheapest option when it comes to a home gym is to invest in a bench and a set of barbells. But Minniti cautions that it might be difficult for other people to use your barbells if the weight doesn't suit them. And while it's possible to buy a treadmill or a stationary bicycle for dirt cheap, there's no guarantee that it will be a comfortable model that fits your body type, and poor-quality machines will not necessarily withstand rigorous use. Having a higher budget makes it more likely that you'll find an exercise machine that's durable, comfortable for you to use and adjustable to suit your needs.

The cheapest option when it comes to a home gym is to invest in a bench and a set of barbells'

Finally, says Minniti, if you're going to invest in a home gym, make sure it's something you're really going to use. The last thing anyone needs is another clothes hanger.

Landscaping companies feature customized looks

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Whether it's patio stones, awnings or flower beds, landscaping products can beautify your home and even protect the environment in the process.

Experts say the trick to meeting your landscaping needs is to find a provider that offers services and products that are tailor-made to your preferences.

"We have experienced sales staff who can make recommendations… and find that fine line between what the customers request and the best product to suit the environment," says Hugh Kayler, general manger of Pike's Awnings.

"The product needs more than just a single aspect. For instance, it can add outdoor space and also have an aesthetic value."

In business since 1881, Pike's provides an array of products, including awnings, elaborate patio coverings, terrace tops and enclosures.

Kayler notes that Pike's suppliers and manufacturers typically offer five-year warranties, and he emphasizes that warranties are a reflection of a company's standard of quality.

"A warranty is only as good as the company," he says.

"Obviously, a well-established company… is going to be up front about their warranties."

It's no secret that price is high on the list of things to consider when making a purchase, so make sure you can afford what appeals to your eye.

"Most of [the buying process] is based on cost and look," says Tania Pacitto, assistant office manager at Beaver Valley Stone, which offers a host of natural stones, interlocking products and retaining walls.

"So you have to create a budget."

Once your budget is set, Pacitto suggests finding a company that puts customers first.

"We have great customer service," she says of the family business founded in 1989, which boasts a 10-acre outdoor showroom displaying natural stones from such exotic places as India and Brazil.

"[Sales staff] can help you make your decisions by listening to what you have to say and what you want."

Customer service is integral, particularly when there is a problem with the product.

"When a customer calls [for help], the contractor should be there the same day and solve the problem," says Adi Arbid of Aviv Irrigation Systems.

"If you call me and say I have a pipe that's burst… I will go to the customer right away. It's like 9-1-1."

Arbid honed his skills working on vast expanses of kibbutzim and moshavim in Israel.

He sells and installs such products as sprinklers and custom-designed flower beds.

The irrigation expert notes that modern innovations in landscaping are focused on environmental stewardship.

For instance, some sprinkler systems now offer a built-in rain sensor, which triggers the sprinkler to turn on based on whether rain has fallen, so as to conserve water.

"If somebody's favourite colour is pink or purple, then we can make it pink or purple," says Kayler.

"We're doing things with fantastic fabrics and nice details… as people are realizing that the product can be very customized."

To contact Pike's Awnings, call, toll free, 800-268-3748 or visit www.pikesawnings.com.

Getting rid of clutter can save time

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Professional organizers Marilyn Anthony and Susan Cohen have found many lost treasures.

Partners in the company ClutterCutters (416-516-4554), Anthony and Cohen have, in the course of their organizational work, found money, Israeli bonds, jewelry and sentimental objects that their clients had lost or misplaced amid the clutter of their homes and offices.

Cohen recalls helping a young client organize his office and discovering Israeli bonds that had matured. "We were going through old paperwork and files, opening up envelopes that had never been opened. My client had completely forgotten that he had bought the bonds. He was really quite thrilled," she says.

Susan Cohen and Marilyn Anthony

Meanwhile, Anthony was working upstairs reorganizing the kitchen with his wife. The couple had been married for about three years but had not yet opened their wedding gifts.

On that day, after unpacking some old boxes, she found silver jewelry belonging to the young woman's late mother. "It had been stored for years," says Anthony. "It was incredibly meaningful for her. They were small items, but they had tremendous sentimental value."

She says it is common for people to find things they don't realize they have as we tend to accumulate so much. "At every job, we have found something of value."

Anthony and Cohen, friends since high school, became partners in the professional organizing field three years ago.

Both women had left jobs in the arts. Anthony, a professional musician, had been the principal orchestral librarian for the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra in Tel Aviv for 20 years. She returned to Toronto with her husband and two sons in 1998.

Cohen is a former director of arts programs at the Ontario Council for the Arts and a freelance broadcaster and arts events organizer, among other things.

The two friends wanted career changes that would give them freedom and independence and more flexibility, Anthony says, noting that professional organizing was a natural choice for them. "We realized we had these talents. We're both very organized. We wanted to do something completely different with these talents and we are loving it."

She explains that in their previous professional lives, she and Cohen had spent much of their time developing systems to keep their respective arts organizations running smoothly.

"When you're doing arts shows, you have to be organized and work within larger schedules," Cohen says. "You learn to project manage.

"We're teaching people how to break things down into smaller tasks and units, to set smaller goals and tasks to make things achievable."

People's homes are overloaded, she continues. "We live in a very materialistic society. People have huge amounts of everything.

"We're supposed to be living in a paperless society, but we have more paper than ever, more electronic gadgets than ever and if anything, we have more things than ever, which leads to more clutter and more stress."

People spend an hour a day looking for things, she contends. "We want to give people back that time. We go through their day to find out where the bottlenecks are around organization: is it related to having too much stuff, procrastination or a pack-rack mentality? Each person needs a solution."

With more people taking work home or working from home and setting up home offices, "people are working all over the place at home," says Anthony . "Everything is bleeding into everything else. People need to set up boundaries in terms of space."

CutterClutters specialize in residential, home office, collections, downsizing homes and staging homes for sale, she says. "Residential and home offices are our specialty.

"People can call or e-mail (www.wecutclutter.com) us for a consultation and we can advise them on how they can proceed or we can just come and start working.

"We like to do a consultation to see if there's a personality fit with the client and us, so that they'll feel comfortable working with us."

She stresses that when ClutterCutters take on a job, she and Cohen always work with the client. "We don't make decisions about what to discard. The clients have to make the decision. It can be quite stressful. We have leading questions to help them decide."

Their clients also get homework assignments between sessions. "We are very motivational. We're like personal trainers," adds Cohen. "We help people get organized and stay organized. We try to set up systems that the people can keep up themselves.

"We can have a maintenance program to give the clients some extra support, so they can keep up the changes. If you work so hard to set it up, you don't want to go back to the way things were. It takes six weeks to make these routines a habit."

She says people need to learn that everything has a place and they have to tackle small messes before they snowball. "The more it builds up, the more daunting it is."

The average session with CutterClutters lasts three to four hours. The company can tailor a program for every budget, adds Anthony. "We're very quick. We can do a small office in three hours. And the organizational systems are customized. Every system is different. There's no one size fits all. We make a system for the individual."

Both women say they find organizing people's lives and spaces very rewarding.

"You leave somebody who has called you in because they're in need, so much happier," says Anthony. "They feel so grateful when you finish, you feel like you're doing a mitzvah."

Condominium
a gateway to trendy and affluent neighbourhoods

By SHERI SHEFA
Special to The CJN

Standing at the corner of St. Clair Avenue and Bathurst Street, the 22-storey Forest Hill Condominium is sure to be the next hot spot for those looking for a new home.

Jo-Anne Azzarello, the vice-president of marketing for the Goldman Group, a company known all over North America and Israel as a successful real estate development group, calls the Forest Hill "the gateway to the affluent Forest Hill neighbourhood, the trendy Wychwood Park community and a rapidly revitalizing St. Clair Avenue West.

Azzarello says that what makes this building so special for the community is that even if you have to move to another residence, you can do so without having to leave Forest Hill, for a reasonable price.

For those who need to commute, the Forest Hill is steps away from TTC bus stops, the subway line and streetcars.

"It offers a ton of flexibility in terms of location – you don't have to rely on two or three vehicles," Azzarello says.

If the hustle and bustle of city life is too overwhelming, there are several parks in the area to offset the busy streets, including Winston Churchill Park and Cedarvale Ravine.

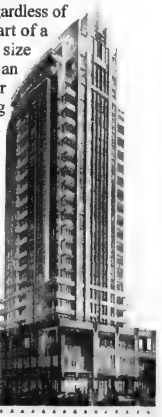
The location is ideal for observant Jews who need to be within walking distance of a synagogue. Bathurst is known as a haven for shuls.

The condominium is conveniently surrounded by eight schools, including Forest Hill Collegiate and Hillcrest Public school, which is a plus for a young family.

But convenience was not the only concern when the Goldman Group made plans to erect this condominium. The Goldman Group has a reputation for constructing trendy buildings and the Forest Hill is no exception. The effort to make this building stylish is apparent. The interior of the building has an art deco influence, which complements the combination of tinted glazing and brick on the outside. The style was intentionally adopted from the Yorkville urban design guidelines.

Those who think a building's décor should come second to the condo's amenities will be impressed by the state-of-the-art security, the fitness centre, a Miami-style outdoor patio with an all-season whirlpool, a sauna, a guest suite for extended-stay visitors, a billiard room, a library – and even a movie theatre.

As for the suites themselves, the Forest Hill offers suites to suit the needs of everyone regardless of whether the buyer is a bachelor or part of a growing family. The condos range in size from a one-bedroom suite to ones with an eat-in kitchen, an over-sized master bedroom, open concept living and dining room areas and multiple balconies with unobstructed views of the city.



"The views make this a special building. In the fall when the leaves are changing, the view is quite spectacular," she said.

The price of a suite at the Forest Hill starts at about $200,000 and construction of the condominium is slated to be completed in 2007. The sales centre, at 396 Spadina Rd., north of St. Clair, is now open and private appointments are available. For more information, call 416-868-0500 or visit www.foresthill.com.

IDF thwarts Gaza attack

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel Defence Forces troops thwarted a multi-pronged Palestinian attack on the Gaza Strip settlement of Kfar Darom before dawn last Friday, killing one of the militants in an exchange of fire.

The attempted attack is the latest episode in a recent escalation of Palestinian shelling in the Gaza Strip. There were no Israeli casualties, although the IDF said the attack was intended to cause many deaths. Military officials said they suspect the attack had been planned for a long time.

Last Friday afternoon, dozens of Kfar Darom residents began marching toward the neighbouring village of Dir al-Balah, where the attack originated, to protest the shelling. The protesters were heading toward the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) building, where they said the militants had been hiding.

Hamas renews violence

But IDF troops intercepted the settlers a short distance from the entrance to the settlement, halting the march. The settlers dispersed after they were promised a meeting with the division commander to discuss the security of settlement. Hamas said it carried out the attack in co-operation with the Fatah-linked Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades and the Popular Resistance Committees, an umbrella group of armed factions.

In the last two years, multiple Palestinian groups have co-ordinated several other multi-pronged attacks in Gaza, mainly at the Erez and Karni crossings.

Gaza brigade commander Col. Moti Kidor said Palestinian police officers spotted the militants but did nothing to prevent them from opening fire on Kfar Darom, Israel Radio reported.

Three Palestinians infiltrated an abandoned building near Kfar Darom and fired mortar shells and six anti-tank missiles at the settlement.

Canada's efforts on Nazis get poor grade

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada's efforts to bring Nazi war criminals to justice have slowed to a crawl while around the world new investigations have grown by leaps and bounds, according to a report prepared by the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Jerusalem.

In a letter-grade handed out to mark countries' Nazi-hunting efforts, Canada's mark for the period April 1, 2004, to March 31, 2005, fell to C from B in the year before.

"No serious progress appears to have been made," stated Efraim Zuroff, director of the centre's Israel office and co-ordinator of its research on Nazi war criminals worldwide.

"There were no new cases and no deportation of people ordered out. [War crimes prosecutions] seem to be in deep trouble," Zuroff said.

The Simon Wiesenthal Center's fifth annual Status Report on the Worldwide Investigation and Prosecution of Nazi War Criminals granted the highest grade, an A, to the United States and singled out Ukraine "as the country which has done the least in recent years to bring Nazis to justice."

Denmark and Hungary each received a B, while Canada joined Australia, Poland, Latvia and Germany, among others, with a C.

CJN reporter tells Ethiopian tale

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Anna Morgan is passionate about things. She is passionate about her responsibilities as a journalist for The Canadian Jewish News, about the necessity for excellence in educational philosophies and techniques, about her family. Most recently, she has become fascinated by Africa, particularly the story of Ethiopian Jews.

She is so fascinated, in fact, that she has recently published Daughters of the Ark, a book for children age 10 and over published by Second Story Press. It was scheduled to be officially launched at a reception at Holy Blossom Temple on May 25, at 7 p.m.

Daughters of the Ark tells the story of Debritu, a 14-year-old Ethiopian Jewish girl who, together with her two younger brothers, makes her way across miles of hostile and dangerous country before finally arriving in Israel in 1984, during Operation Moses.

Police Lauded on Hate

CALGARY— The Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center cited the Calgary Police Service (CPS) last week for fighting Internet hate. Leo Adler, Friends' director of national affairs, honoured Sgt. Frank Foley of the CPS diversity resources unit and Const. Kathy Macdonald of its crime prevention unit. Adler was in town to publicize the centre's new CD-ROM report on terror and hate-related websites.

WORLD

Jews are Old: Report

JERUSALEM — According to data released last week by the Myers-JDC-Brookdale Institute in Jerusalem, a study found that 16 per cent of Jews in Israel and the Diaspora are over 65, more than twice the average proportion of elderly worldwide. One of the study's editors cited as possible reasons the tendency of younger Jews to assimilate or have fewer children, as well as the relative affluence of Jews in much of the world, meaning that more survive to old age.

Cemetery Desecrated

MOSCOW— Moscow's main Jewish cemetery was vandalized May 14. Vandals damaged 15 tombstones and left anti-Semitic graffiti on two graves in the Vostryakovskoe Jewish cemetery in a Moscow suburb, police said. Prosecutors are treating the incident as a hate crime. Meanwhile, on May 15, Chabad held a ceremony in a Jewish cemetery in Malachovka, near Moscow, for books damaged in a May 10 fire that destroyed a historic wooden shul. Arson is suspected.

Ombuds for NPR

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Corporation for Public Broadcasting (CPB) last month appointed two ombuds, one liberal and one conservative, to monitor National Public Radio's Mideast coverage, after receiving complaints from Republican Jewish activist Cheryl Halpern and Democratic congressman Brad Sherman, the New York Times reported. The CPB allocates federal funds for public radio and TV. Some Jewish activists have called NPR's Mideast coverage biased since the intifadah began in 2000.

$7.3M Bar Mitzvah

MONTE CARLO — Anglo-Jewish retail tycoon Philip Green hired chart-topping band Destiny's Child to play at his son Brandon's bar mitzvah party on the French Riviera. Green held the three-day-long event at France's posh Grand Hotel du Cap-Ferrat earlier this month. Green lives in nearby Monaco, but chartered a plane to bring 300 guests to the party, said to have cost $7.3 million (US). Green, 53, spent some $9 million on his 50th birthday party, where Tom Jones and Rod Stewart performed.

Envoy Meets Pollard

WASHINGTON— Israel's ambassador to Washington met with Jonathan Pollard last week, a first. Daniel Ayalon visited Pollard May 17 at the North Carolina prison where he is serving a life sentence for spying for Israel. Pollard, who was granted Israeli citizenship in 1995, has demanded such a visit for years, saying the United States otherwise would not take his release requests seriously. Ayalon said he conveyed "a message of strength and support" and Israel's support for his release on humanitarian grounds. Ha'aretz reported that Pollard, an ex-U.S. Navy intelligence analyst, was unhappy, feeling the meeting lacked substance.

New Pope off to Shul?

VATICAN CITY— Pope Benedict XVI has told Israel's ambassador to the Vatican that he will visit the main synagogue in Cologne, Germany, in August, becoming only the second pope in history, after predecessor John Paul II, to visit a shul. Oded Ben-Hur said the Pope told him of his intention after an audience with the Vatican diplomatic corps earlier this month. Pope John Paul II visited Rome's synagogue in 1986. The new pope said he intends to continue John Paul's work on improving Catholic-Jewish relations.

Businessman Gives School Record Donation

REGINA — Kenneth Levene, a former Regina businessman who now lives in Calgary, gave a record $4 million to the University of Regina last week.

Kenneth Levene

The gift, the school's largest ever from one person, will go to the graduate business school, now called the Kenneth Levene Graduate School of Business.

Levene dedicated his gift to his parents David and Margery. Members of the Levene family, who were active in Regina's Jewish community and Beth Jacob Synagogue, ran Crescent Furniture for 55 years until it closed in 1984. Founded in 1929 by Levene's Russian-born grandfather, the firm also had stores in Swift Current and Moose Jaw, Sask.

"This gift serves to express my thanks to this city and province for affording our family the chance to pursue our dreams in a land of freedom and opportunity," Levene said.

Power couple launches fight against anti-Semitism

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

Late-night television news is a precursor to slumber for many viewers, but one night last spring, it was more of a wake-up call for Elizabeth Comper.

After a crowd of 2,500 gathered at Leah Posluns Theatre to condemn the rash of hate crimes plaguing Toronto at the time, Comper – the wife of Tony Comper, president and CEO of BMO Financial Group – watched news coverage of the rally in the privacy of her home.

Coalition of non-Jewish business leaders creates FAST

"I couldn't be there that evening, and after that I had to do something," she said.

Noting that 2004 was the worst year in more than half a century for anti-Jewish activity in Canada – according to B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, there were 857 reported incidents of harassment, violence and vandalism last year alone – Elizabeth Comper said she and her husband resolved take action.

Now in its launching stage, Fighting Anti-Semitism Together (FAST) is a coalition of non-Jewish Canadian business executives who "are encouraging other non-Jewish leaders to stand up and be counted against the oldest hatred in human history," said Paul Deegan, head of government and public relations for BMO Financial Group.

Elizabeth and Tony Comper

So far, about 20 chief executives have signed on to fund FAST. Many of its supporters are household names, Deegan said, including Peter Godsoe, former chairman of the Bank of Nova Scotia; Rick Waugh, president and CEO of Bank of Nova Scotia; and Dominic D'Allessandro, CEO of Manulife Financial Corp.

"They believe it is time to speak out, challenge others to speak out and get more people to join the cause," Deegan said.

"We're sending out the message that the Jewish people are not alone," Tony Comper said. "We have a prestigious group associated with the project, an impressive roster. And we hope it will broaden over time."

To promote FAST, he will address the Empire Club of Canada on June 16.

With money collected from corporate donors and in conjunction with Canadian Jewish Congress, the Compers will launch an educational project this fall targeted at public schools that aims to educate both Jewish and non-Jewish students about eradicating anti-Semitism.

Elizabeth Comper said a DVD is currently being filmed and will be used in classrooms to prompt discussion and foster awareness. Canadian Idol host Ben Mulroney will introduce the four-part video series.

"Something like [FAST] has never been done before in any place that we know of," she said. "This isn't just a Jewish issue. This is an issue of every single person living in Canada. If we can change or move one child, then it's all worth it."

To date, the Compers have raised more than $200,000 for FAST and they plan to promote their initiative across the country.

BLINDNESS IS NOT THE END OF THE WORLD ... IT'S NOT EASY BUT I HAVE NO OPTION

On Sunday, Aug. 4, 2002, Eyal Neufeld's life changed forever. The 19-year-old soldier was returning to his military unit after visiting his family in Carmiel. On the bus, Eyal remembers noticing a man wearing a yellow T-shirt and whispering to two passengers, who then both left the bus at the next stop. Seven metres from Eyal's destination, that same man started screaming, grabbed the soldier sitting next to him and blew himself up.

Eyal reached the hospital in critical condition. He was unconscious for two months and woke up blind and deaf.

"Those days ... I would wake up to silence and darkness. I believed it to be another nightmare and went back to sleep."

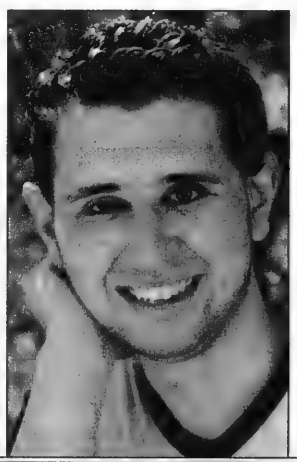
"I talked but could not hear the replies, I sang not even knowing to whom I was singing. I did not know what the time was, who touched me and who brought me water to drink. I had no idea what had happened or the extent of my injuries – there was no way to communicate."

Crying for days, "why me," Eyal realized that he had to continue on with his life.

After 2 months of operations, a hearing device was implanted in one of his ears, and Eyal was able to hear again. A year after his injury, Eyal moved to a house in Afeka, to live near Beit Halochem, Tel Aviv.

Everyday Eyal goes to Beit Halochem, where he plays Goal Ball (soccer for the blind); he works out in the well-equipped fitness room and afterwards socializes with other disabled friends and family.

"I am so grateful to have a place that I can go to and where I fit in. Beit Halochem has helped me cope with my disability and made me realize that life does continue."



Eyal Neufeld was 19 years old when he was blinded in a terrorist attack on a bus in 2002.

PLEASE ASSIST the more than 50,000 disabled war veterans and victims of terrorism who turn to Beit Halochem to help them in their recovery.

Foiglman soars

Foiglman, by Israeli author Aharon Megged (The Toby Press), is one of the best books I have read in a long time. Narrated in melancholy reminiscence by a professor of Jewish history, the story that unfolds is an insightful, painfully poignant tale of complex human relationships and moving personal struggle.

The key relationship in the story is that of history professor Zvi Arbel and Yiddish poet Shmuel Foiglman. Megged artfully describes the curious friendship between these two men – outwardly different in virtually every respect – and the invisible lines that spin out of it in which other individuals, in particular Arbel's wife, Nora, become entangled.

From the editor's desk

Arbel, born in Israel, is a chronicler of eastern European Jewish history. In contradistinction to his father, a renowned archeologist who spent a lifetime uncovering the secrets of the civilizations buried underneath Israeli soil, Arbel toils to uncover and record the lachrymose Jewish experience underneath European soil, as it were. In fact it is one of Arbel's published works, The Great Betrayal, an examination of the 17th-century Chmielnicki pogroms, which attracts the attention of Shmuel Foiglman.

Foiglman, a Holocaust survivor from Poland who lives in Paris, is so taken by Arbel's book, he sends the Israeli a book of Yiddish poems with a personal note of inscription of thanks to the history professor. The unexpected, though as it turns out decidedly not serendipitous, arrival of the book in the professor's mail sets in motion a train of events that transports the reader through the innermost conflicts of the human heart, revelatory meditations upon Jewish history and scholarly discussions of the interplay between language and culture.

Foiglman the poet follows the trajectory of his book of Yiddish poems and also arrives at Arbel's home. Vulnerable, dependent and scarred by his experiences in the war, he is the literary instrument by and through which Megged brilliantly depicts the tensions between Israeli and Diaspora life, between Hebrew and Yiddish, between empathy and indifference and between compassion and cruelty.

Arbel helps Foiglman get his poetry translated into Hebrew and published in Israel. It is a dream come true for Foiglman, but the awakening is not the resolution either Foiglman or Arbel could have wanted or anticipated. And yet, through his efforts on behalf of the Yiddish-speaking poet from Paris, the Israeli reaches deeper understandings about his own work and about the people whose tearful past it has been his professional role to chronicle and whom Foiglman embodies so entirely.

Megged is a profusely talented writer. His novels, short stories, children's stories, plays and novellas have won him wide acclaim in Israel and abroad. His works have been translated into Spanish, French, Romanian, Russian, Italian and German. And it is no wonder. He is extremely adept at characterization. He gives his readers full, sometimes sorrowful, but always illuminating access into the narrow chambers of the troubled minds and wounded hearts of the people in his stories. We can relate to those people because we can recognize them in our own experiences. They are archetypes to be sure, but they are also specific individuals whose emotions are our own.

The Toby Press published Marganit Weinberger-Rotman's English translation of Foiglman in February 2003, some 15 years after its first appearance in Hebrew. That same year, Megged received the prestigious Israel Prize for his many contributions over the decades, through his writing, to the development of Israeli culture and society. Toby Press is planning to release The Living on the Dead by Megged this October in paperback. He deserves as wide a readership in the Diaspora as he has in Israel.

* * *

The Toby Press, a five-year-old Jerusalem-based publishing house, is endeavouring to acquaint the English-speaking world with many of the gems of modern Hebrew literature.

It has introduced The Toby Hebrew Classics to bring to reading life out-of-print works by authors such as Haim Nachman Bialik and M.Y. Berdichevsky, to name just two. The Classics will complement already published works by authors such as Haim Sabato, Amos Oz, Naomi Ragen and Haim Lapid. The translation of Israeli literature is in addition to The Toby Press' ambitious program of finding new authors from around the world and re-setting and printing many of the classics of the Western canon.

The Toby Press is slowly building a bridge across two Jewish worlds, the dynamic, richly diverse realm of Israeli literature and the voracious reading public, mostly unaware of the new and old authors in Israel, that is Diaspora Jewry.

The press is to be commended for its effort. We are the beneficiaries.

Overall, the report found "the number of new investigations initiated [in at least 11 countries] during the past 12 months reached the figure of 659 [an increase of 97 per cent over the previous year] and the number of cases currently under investigation [in 15 countries] reached at least 1,218 [an increase of almost 30 per cent over the figure for the period from April 1, 2003-March 31, 2004]."

The report found that during the period under review, legal proceedings were initiated against six Nazi war criminals in four countries – three in the United States, one in Hungary, one in Denmark and one in Lithuania. In the same period, five convictions were obtained, all in the United States.

"Most of those convicted served as armed guards in concentration and death camps in Poland and Germany," the report stated.

"From Jan. 1, 2001, until March 31, 2005, a total of 32 convictions of Nazi war criminals were obtained all over the world. Of these convictions, 23 were in the United States."

Zuroff said the lack of new prosecutions in Canada is troubling. Despite the addition of Irwin Cotler – a longstanding advocate for strong measures against war criminals – to the cabinet as justice minister, "there is no political will in Canada," Zuroff said.

"I believe that Canada has basically given up. They seem to be going through the motions and it doesn't seem to be getting anywhere… There is an increasing feeling that the government is totally oblivious, apathetic on this issue."

Efraim Zuroff

Hungary earned a B for issuing an international arrest warrant seeking the extradition from Australia of Karoly (Charles) Zentai, who is alleged to have participated in manhunts, persecution and murder of the Jews of Budapest in 1944.

Zentai was discovered as part of Operation: Last Chance, a program initiated by the centre, which offered cash rewards for information leading to the arrest and conviction of war criminals.

Operation: Last Chance also uncovered Milivoj Asner residing in Klagenfurt, Austria. Asner served as chief of police in Slavonska Pozega, Croatia, throughout World War II and allegedly played an active role in the persecution and deportation to death of hundreds of Jews, Gypsies and Serbs.

Ukraine, meanwhile, "hasn't done a thing. They don't want to do a thing," Zuroff said.

As in the Baltic states, many Ukrainians consider those who collaborated with the Nazis anti-Communist heroes, he noted.

Temple Har Zion's founding rabbi set to retire

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Michael Stroh had no intention of becoming a congregational rabbi when he entered Hebrew Union College (HUC) in New York, but a mandatory stint at a congregation sparked a desire to change course.

Originally, he said in an interview earlier this month in his study at Temple Har Zion in Thornhill, he just wanted to pursue Jewish studies and become a professor. But at the time, he said, there were few Jewish studies options at secular universities below the graduate level.

At the end of June, Rabbi Stroh will retire after more than 30 years as rabbi of Har Zion. He is being honoured at a series of temple events in June.

The rabbi, a native of Queens, New York, first came to Toronto in 1966 to serve as assistant rabbi, and later associate rabbi, of Holy Blossom Temple.

He credits Rabbi Gunther Plaut – whose scholarly reputation was a large part of the attraction of the Holy Blossom position – for showing him that scholarship could be a significant part of a congregational rabbi's life, and also for influencing his attitudes towards Zionism and Israel in positive ways.

Rabbi Stroh, 66, has seen Har Zion grow from eight families when he took on the new position in 1971 to more than 600, although he said congregants still see it as a "small, heimish, family synagogue. That's the atmosphere we want to have."

The temple is known for its good relationship with its longtime Muslim neighbour, the Ja'affari Islamic Centre, a subject that Rabbi Stroh and the centre's imam, Mohammed Rizvi, have been interviewed about together. The two buildings share a parking lot and have had joint programming. Last year, they raised money together for Montreal's United Talmud Torahs' elementary school, after library there was firebombed, and for the Al Mahdi Islamic Centre in Pickering, which was also the target of hate-related arson.

Rabbi Michael Stroh

Over the years, Rabbi Stroh has also seen changes in the Reform movement, most notably in its return to tradition and its pioneering role in ordaining women as rabbis. "When I first entered the rabbinate, I didn't even think in terms of female rabbis," he said.

Regarding the greater Jewish community in Toronto, he said he is saddened by the decreased amount of co-operation he sees between Orthodox and non-Orthodox rabbis.

"Reform and Conservative get along swell," he said. "We have differences of opinion, but we co-operate with each other."

But local Orthodox congregational rabbis do not join the Toronto Board of Rabbis (TBR), an organization of which Rabbi Stroh is a past president. He believes that in many cities, that is not the case, or that it wasn't the case in the late 1990s, when he found that many of his counterparts at a meeting of presidents of boards of rabbis were, in fact, Orthodox.

"I think it's a pity," he said. "It would be wonderful for the community if we could co-operate, and wonderful for the rabbis if we could talk to each other." Before he arrived in Toronto, he noted, the TBR's predecessor, the Toronto Rabbinical Fellowship, was founded by Rabbi Plaut, along with rabbis Stuart Rosenberg and Walter Wurzburger, representing the Conservative and Orthodox streams respectively. "That couldn't happen now."

Rabbi Stroh is also a past president of ARZA Canada (the Canadian Association of Reform Zionists), among his other involvements.

Throughout his career, his academic bent has been a constant thread, both at Har Zion and elsewhere. A past instructor in Jewish theology at the University of Waterloo, he has also taught at the University of Toronto's University of St. Michael's College and at HUC.

At the synagogue, he's had "wonderful teaching experiences, and I have been able to establish a growing group of people who are interested in studying on a very sophisticated level."

His rabbinate has been "wonderfully Jewishly satisfying," he said. "I don't regret for one moment that this is what I did."

Following his retirement, he will serve as part-time executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and will also continue teaching at Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning and Holy Blossom. Rabbi Michal Shekel, the temple's associate rabbi, will serve as interim rabbi.

Abbas courting his own downfall

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas was scheduled to visit Washington this week. The diplomatic gesture on the part of the Bush administration is significant, because it gives Abbas a deference and overt respect that Washington never gave to his predecessor, Yasser Arafat. It is no coincidence that Abbas' visit precedes the elections for a new Palestinian legislative assembly slated for mid-July. The U.S. administration wants to boost Abbas' stature in the eyes of his people, and a highly publicized stroll through the verdant grounds of the White House alongside the president of the United States could be a good way to do so.

The Israeli leadership also wants to extend a supportive hand to Abbas if it will help him stave off the Hamas military, and now political, apparatus nipping at his heels. That's why, despite the fact that Palestinians fired some 14 mortars at the Gush Katif communities last Thursday, as well as four Qassam rockets at Sderot and anti-tank missiles at Israeli troops in Gaza, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, with the blessing of the army, approved a series of gestures to the Palestinians aimed at strengthening the PA leader against his rival Hamas.

Meanwhile, the Jerusalem Post reported last week that Palestinian Authority security officials told the paper that "a new Muslim terrorist group linked to Al Qaeda has started operating in the Gaza Strip."

The group, called Jundallah, or "Allah's Brigades," consists mostly of scores of former Hamas and Islamic Jihad members, the officials disclosed, who are opposed to Hamas' "pragmatic" approach to dealing with Israel. Jundallah is a radical Muslim faction with close ties to Al Qaeda in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iraq, said one PA official.

Abu Abdallah al-Khattab, a spokesperson for Jundallah in the Gaza Strip, said his organization would not honour the unofficial truce with Israel. "We don't attach any importance to this truce, because the occupation forces are continuing their crimes against our people," he added.

Also last week, Sharon's advisor Dov Weissglas met with Palestinian minister Saeb Erekat and called for an immediate halt to shelling attacks by Palestinian militants. Weissglas warned Erekat that if the Palestinians continue shelling Israeli targets in and around the Gaza Strip, the Israel Defence Forces will respond harshly.

A harsh response by Israel is precisely what Hamas and their fellow terrorists want, since violence directed against the Palestinians, they know, would sow more seeds of disenchantment against the PA establishment and diminish Abbas in the eyes of his constituents.

It is an old script, but the forces opposed to peace play it well.

In Washington, Abbas will surely complain about the Israelis for their alleged sins of omission and commission, and hope that the beautiful Rose Garden photos are beamed back to television sets in Ramallah. But if he fails to take steps against the radical terrorist elements within his own society, he will only have himself to blame when, inevitably, they train their guns on him, even if, or especially if, he defeats them at the ballot box.

The Jewish graveyard called Poland

My 16-year-old daughter was in Poland as a participant on the 2005 March of the Living. Although intellectually I feel fulfilled that I have provided my child with a life-altering experience, I am grieving for her loss of innocence. She has travelled through the Jewish graveyard called Poland and the impact has undoubtedly been profound.

It is a bitter irony that Poland is now benefiting economically from this annual tourism pilgrimage after turning its back on the wholesale slaughter of its Jewish community.

Unfairness to Poles

It is widely known that the history of World War II, and particularly the role of Poles, has been misinterpreted ("From Poland to Israel: revelling in nationhood," CJN, May 19).

Please be informed that Poles were the first people to risk their lives to bring photos and information about the extermination of Jews and about Auschwitz to the U.S. and British governments. Nobody wanted to listen to them.

I do not understand why so many unfair words have been written about the treatment of Jews by Poles, who feel the truest and deepest compassion for Jews, who among European and world nations keep the greatest remembrance of World War II tragedy, and who shared the pain and tragedy dying side by side with Jews.

Not in My Name (1)

Hashomer Hatzair and its summer camp, Camp Shomria, are Zionist, plain and simple. The parts about the camp in the film Not in My Name, noted in "A blunt message about the anti-Israel Jewish left" (CJN, April 14), provide an incomplete picture of a comprehensive educational program. While some of the Camp Shomria footage may cause discomfort, the suggestion that this might make Hashomer Hatzair a part of the "self-hating" or "radical left" is completely absurd and not borne out by the facts.

Hashomer Hatzair has been at the forefront of the Zionist movement since it was established in 1913. It has had a large stake in the betterment of Israel, and it remains a strong, principled voice for Israel. We established the kibbutz movement, strengthened and defended Israel's borders, and continue to work within the democratic political system of the Israeli parliament.

The organization Hashomer Hatzair examines its own as well as its members' views, relationships and identities surrounding Israel and Zionism in a critical way. We encourage a challenging engagement with all the issues precisely because of our firm foundation in Zionism.

Countering extremism from both the left and the right wings of the Jewish and Zionist communities continues to be a struggle that Hashomer Hatzair is committed to.

Not in My Name (2)

I must commend the Toronto Jewish Film Festival for showing Not in My Name. It took most of the audience, and me, by surprise, as I expected to hear more criticism of Israeli policies. Instead, we heard that the extreme Jewish left has subdued the moderate Jewish left.

From the film, it also appeared that the left criticizes Israel because they want Israel to be like Canada, a non-sectarian state where everyone is equal and where Jews can live in peace. That, of course, is a good description of Canada, but it is not, nor was it ever intended to be, Israel. Israel was created as a Jewish state, a homeland for Jews, not for others.

When the left criticizes Israel for not being Canada, it shows its complete misunderstanding of the purpose of Israel's existence. The film made this very clear. Criticism of Israel for doing what is needed to maintain Israel as a Jewish state is inappropriate and should be left to non-Jews.

Israel and Germany

40 years of diplomatic relations

The following remarks were delivered at a ceremony May 17 in Toronto marking 40 years of diplomatic relations between Germany and Israel.

By YA'ACOV BROSH

This week, 40 years ago, in a process started by Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion and Germany's chancellor Konrad Adenauer, Israel and Germany established diplomatic relations. The relations were established in the shadow of the Holocaust – the terrible crime that was committed by the Nazi regime of the Third Reich against the Jewish people.

Ya'acov Brosh

The people in Israel will never be able to erase the memory of the Holocaust. At the same time, the relationship between Germany and Israel today is a special combination of the past and the future. For the memory of the people who died and for the coming generations, the two sides have an ongoing commitment to remember the past and to educate for the future, with special focus on the youth of today who will shape the societies of the next generation.

Today, the government and the people of Germany are vital partners with Israel is all areas. Germany has reiterated many times her commitment to the secure existence of Israel, and Germany acts bilaterally and in international forums to strengthen the position and the security of Israel. Germany is counted as one of Israel's strongest allies and closest friends. Germany helps Israel, not only in security issues, but also in negotiations for the release of Israeli soldiers who are held as prisoners in other countries in the Middle East. Germany also assists in locating Israeli soldiers missing in action.

Today, Germany is the leading country in Europe fighting against anti-semitism and leads a political line that supports Israel in the European Union. The trade relations, tourism, research and academic co-operation between Germany and Israel are among the most intensive that Israel has with any country in the world.

Despite the painful past, today we are speaking of a great friend of Israel. The government of Israel, which marked this week 40 years since the establishment of diplomatic relation between the two states, has made it clear that Israel will continue to work hard to strengthen and develop the friendly relations, co-operation and understanding between our two countries.

The following are excerpts from an address delivered at a ceremony May 17 in Toronto marking 40 years of diplomatic relations between Germany and Israel.

By DR. KLAUS RUPPRECHT

It is by no means a matter of course that we commemorate the 40th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between Israel and Germany tonight. In the past few weeks, we have been constantly reminded of the historical background for our relations.

The pictures of the celebrations of the 60th anniversaries of the liberation of country after country in Europe from Nazi occupation, the pictures of the liberation of Auschwitz and other concentration camps, and finally the celebrations of the end of World War II in Europe have called into painful memory the sufferings of war and especially the horrors perpetrated against Jews by Germans.

Klaus Rupprecht

I am therefore deeply touched by the presence of those of you in the audience who have suffered in the concentration camps or who have lost loved ones in the Holocaust. Thank you for being here with us tonight. Your presence and the fact that you commemorate this evening together with us urge us and future generations of Germans to be mindful of this horrible past and to build a better future.

It has been said – by the German president, Horst Köhler, among others – that relations between Israel and Germany cannot be "normal" in the conventional sense of the word. History will always cast its shadow over our relations. In view of the horrors committed in the German name against Jews during the Nazi rule, we see it as a miracle that we can already look back at 40 years of diplomatic relations between Israel and Germany.

Only 20 years after the end of World War II and all the horrors it brought to the Jews of Europe, farsighted politicians in both countries, namely Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion and German chancellor Konrad Adenauer, found the courage and strength to establish diplomatic relations between our two countries.

Since then, not only politicians but people from all parts of our societies have worked diligently on both sides to build an ever closer relationship. Today Israel and Germany are close partners – as close as our history allows. We, the younger generations, have to be mindful of the past and of the many efforts to overcome the past.

We cannot, however, rest on the work that has been done by people who came before us.

We have to make every effort to strengthen and to nurture our relationship.

On the German side, we have to remember the past and we have to vigorously fight racist and neo-Nazi tendencies that from time to time raise their ugly heads in our society. If we remain mindful of the past and vigilant in the future, I am confident that we can look forward to an ever deepening relationship between our two peoples and our two countries.

Thank you very much.

Real vs. ersatz choices

We live in a world of choice. For the discriminating grocery shopper, an endless array of salad dressings, breakfast cereals and toilet paper awaits. On TV, there are hundreds of cable channels to entertain us. Or try painting your house – you'd be amazed how many shades of white there actually are. Even the banal act of ordering a coffee can become an overwhelming decision. Was that a grande decaf skim latte, or a venti soy chai?

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

But these are ersatz choices. We often expend a great deal of energy on these minor decisions, because we live in a consumerist culture, surrounded by advertising designed to convince us that meaningless minutiae matter. And while it's nice to have the option, in reality it makes no difference whether you paint your house in "winter white" or "white dove."

Free will is a common belief, based on our own perceptions of freedom of choice. However, many philosophers argue that there is actually no free will. They note that most people's lives are extremely predictable, and that their actions rarely stray far from the routine. While we might imagine we have the free will to choose a particular flavour of ice cream, in the end, whether you pick vanilla or chocolate, you'll still be the same old person. And for the most part, people don't change all that much.

Real choices change lives. If there is free will (and it's a fundamental Jewish belief that there is), it isn't about petty, meaningless decisions. We encounter free will in life's real choices: Will I break those old bad habits, or remain mired in mediocrity? Will I grow, or will I stagnate?

We can make real choices all the time. Dozens of times each day, we decide whether we will transcend the mediocre and act with genuine character. Even small gestures like stopping to shake a hand can be real choices, a small step on the road to personal growth.

Unfortunately, we are so bogged down by a multitude of phony, ersatz choices, that we often overlook the real choices we have to make. We worry about having the best handbag, the best watch, the best power tie, but what about having the best character?

In the documentary 9-11, about a firehouse near Ground Zero, a firefighter is asked why he chose his career. He answered: "I wanted to be able to wake up in the morning and look at myself in the mirror and say I'm doing something with my life".

The next time you shop for paint, think of that firefighter, and remember that "mocha brown" is not a real choice.

A peaceful way to snuff out terror

Ken Basnicki of Toronto, was the 48-year-old financial marketing director for a Canadian software company when Al Qaeda terrorists murdered him – and thousands of others – on Sept. 11, 2001.

His widow Maureen and his daughter Erica, now 25, understand that terrorism does not just affect others. It has ruined too many Canadian lives already. Dr. Yehezkel Goldberg, originally from Toronto, was a social worker extraordinaire, a beloved angel of mercy helping many needy clients, when a Palestinian police-officer-turned-suicide-bomber from Yasser Arafat's Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade killed him and 10 others on a Jerusalem bus last winter.

Gil Troy in Montreal

His widow and seven children have to go through life wondering if any Canadian money helped kill their Canadian father, either through tax-deductible contributions that illegally funded terrorists, or Canadian governmental funds diverted from Arafat's Palestinian Authority to the Fatah terrorists who dispatched the suicide bomber.

These and other terror victims demand justice, not vengeance. They are pursuing a novel method to achieve it. In April, the Canadian Coalition Against Terror asked Parliament to allow terror victims to sue the organizations supporting terrorists and the rogue governments that fund them. The bill would amend the State Immunity Act to say that if any of the 35 groups that Canada has designated as terrorist entities kill Canadians and it can be proved that they received funding from governments, a Canadian civil court could hold those governments financially liable. The bill would also add a provision to the Criminal Code's anti-terrorism provisions to allow Canadian victims or their survivors to sue terror groups in Canadian courts.

This clever legislation aims to choke off the money that sustains terrorists. If governments such as Iran and Syria suffered financially for supporting these mass murderers, if Palestinian Authority leaders feared paying millions of dollars in damages for supporting terror, they might stop financing terror. Moreover, if a Canadian court saddled terrorist groups – or their money-men – with huge liabilities, it could constrain some terrorists, or their Canadian fellow travelers.

The proposed legislation would encourage civil suits against terrorist groups and rogue governments financing these murders. Ultimately, victims or their survivors would have to make the case in court.

These last few years have shown that the fight against terror must be proactive. The terrorists should be on the defensive, not we, their innocent targets. Passivity and neutrality are often substitutes for moral blindness. To ignore the problem puts us all at risk.

Nevertheless, many Canadians are ambivalent about mobilizing the military might of the West against these brigands who have declared war on the West – and all of "crusading" Christendom, if you read Osama Bin Laden's fatwas.

But wherever we stand on that difficult question, we should all unite in declaring zero tolerance for financing terror. Here is an opportunity to demonstrate that the debate is merely tactical, not about the legitimacy of targeting terrorists. All of us who are committed to the rule of law – and who believe in peace, order, and good government – should applaud the Canadian Coalition Against Terror for devising a clever, constructive and peaceful way to fight terror.

Shortly after Sept. 11, a CBC radio interviewer challenged me about my call for an aggressive policy of zero tolerance for terror. "If we're too aggressive, won't the terrorists target us?" the interviewer asked. Of course, we knew then – and certainly know now – that "we " in Canada and throughout the West were already targeted. The Basnickis and the two dozen other Canadian families with loved ones murdered on 9/11 know that. The Goldberg family in Toronto and Jerusalem feels that daily. The hundreds of Canadian families whose lives were ruined in the Air India disaster understand that. We owe it to our fellow citizens, we owe it to ourselves, to be as aggressive as possible in rooting out this rot, in pushing Canada to pursue the 35 terrorist entities – and their immoral government funders.

Twenty years ago, Elie Wiesel protested then U.S. president's Ronald Reagan's plan to visit a German military ceremony with SS graves by warning that in extreme situations, when human lives and dignity are at stake, neutrality is a sin. Here is our chance to stand and say "No to terror." Neither we nor our political leaders can afford to be neutral.

CAUT by surprise

The British Association of University Teachers (AUT) voted just before Passover to boycott two Israeli universities.

The leading union for higher education in Britain, the AUT passed a resolution barring faculty members from Bar Ilan University and the University of Haifa from participating in research projects with British colleagues, or from participating in conferences under the aegis of member universities in Britain. According to the resolution, only Bar Ilan or Haifa faculty who voiced opposition to Israeli policies toward Palestinians would be exempted from the ban.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Many readers may not know of the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT), the Canadian counterpart of the AUT in Britain. The CAUT was founded in 1951 to represent the interests of the academic staff at Canadian institutions of higher education, and to defend academic freedom. The individual faculty associations at different Canadian universities come under the CAUT umbrella as member associations. As a professor at York University, I am a member of the York University Faculty Association, and thus CAUT represents me.

Since the AUT decision to boycott Israeli faculty members, a number of professional and international organizations have come out strongly against the resolution. The Association for Jewish Studies (AJS) – the international society representing professors and researchers in all areas of Jewish studies – has forcefully and publicly condemned the action of the AUT as an "egregious assault on academic freedom" based on an offensive, ill-informed and partisan focus on Israeli politics. The full text of the AJS statement is available on the web (http://www.brandeis.edu/ajs/aut-PR.pdf). Copies of the AJS statement were sent to other academic associations, asking for their endorsement.

As vice-president of the AJS and co-author of its statement, and as a Canadian professor represented by the CAUT, I forwarded a copy to the CAUT president, asking that she pass it along to members of the executive committee for their endorsement. Much to my surprise, within moments of receiving my e-mail, my request was refused. The CAUT, I was informed, "will not interfere in the deliberations of our international counterpart."

By contrast, the American Association of University Professors (AAUP) – an organization dedicated to protecting academic freedom – issued a strongly worded statement of its own, deploring the AUT boycott of Israeli faculty as damaging to the free exchange of ideas. The AAUP found particularly deplorable the AUT's willingness to exclude from their ban any Israeli professor who condemned Israeli policy. Because such an exclusion "requires compliance with a political or ideological test in order for an academic relationship to continue," the AAUP noted, it "deepens the injury to academic freedom rather than mitigates it." (The AAUP statement may be read in its entirety at http://www.aaup.org/newsroom/press/2005/AUT.htm.)

As a Canadian professor, it grieves me that the union representing me and my colleagues falls short of the organization representing American professors. The CAUT calls academic freedom "the life blood of the modern university." It is the right to teach, learn, study and publish free of orthodoxy or threat of reprisal and discrimination. According to the organization's policy statement on academic freedom, "academic staff must enjoy freedom of thought, conscience, religion, expression, assembly and association." While the CAUT speaks for Canadian academicians, it intervenes and offers public comment on issues occurring outside of Canada when it sees fit.

The CAUT refusal to consider criticizing the AUT boycott of faculty at Bar Ilan and Haifa is particularly surprising in view of CAUT's earlier praise for the leadership of the University of Haifa and Hebrew University for "continuing teaching and research on their campuses even in the aftermath of suicide bombings and political unrest." In a 2003 statement deploring the closure of Palestinian universities in Hebron as a response to suicide bombing, the CAUT asserted its belief that "the exploration of all ideas – even revolutionary ideas – is vital to the achievements of peace." Affirmations such as this ring hollow, at best, when viewed alongside CAUT's silence regarding the action of their British counterpart.

Under pressure from some of its members, the AUT will meet to reconsider its April vote to boycott Israeli professors. Should they overturn that vote, as many hope they will, CAUT's response will be moot. But whatever the outcome of the AUT meeting, the silence of the Canadian professors' organization discredits it as an honest broker and genuine advocate for academic freedom.

The drama behind Operation Solomon

Fourteen years ago this week, in Operation Solomon, 14,310 Ethiopian Jews were airlifted to Israel in 34 hours and four minutes.

It was an astonishing and inspirational event, fueled by the promise of Israeli arms to Ethiopia, greased by a hefty bribe to Ethiopian government officials, facilitated in part by the United States and carried out against the backdrop of a civil war in that ancient African nation.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The story of the mission, which unfolded on May 24, 1991, is skillfully told by Stephen Spector in Operation Solomon: The Daring Rescue of the Ethiopian Jews (Oxford University Press). It is based on interviews the author conducted with informants in Israel, Ethiopia and the United States.

Strangely enough, the chain of events that culminated in Operation Solomon began neither in Jerusalem nor in Addis Ababa, but in Moscow. Mengistu Haile Mariam, the Ethiopian strongman, went to Moscow in the summer of 1988 to request further military aid from the Soviet Union. Facing serious uprisings in the northern provinces of Tigre and Eritrea, he was in dire need of an infusion of weapons for his badly battered army.

But on this trip to Moscow, the cash-strapped Mengistu was in for a nasty surprise. Mikhail Gorbachev, the Soviet leader, said he would have to pay for additional weapons. Gorbachev advised Mengistu to seek weapons elsewhere or reach a negotiated agreement with the rebels.

Later that year, he asked China and North Korea for arms, but with little success. He next turned to the United States, but his initiative bore no fruit. Washington considered Ethiopia under Mengistu a pariah regime, on a par with Cuba. The U.S. president, George Bush, who had been involved in the airlift of Ethiopian Jews from Sudan in the mid-1980s in Operation Moses, refused to send weapons to prop up Mengistu.

What to do?

One of Mengistu's advisers suggested that arms might be obtained from Israel, provided Ethiopia reestablished diplomatic relations with the Jewish state. Under Arab pressure, Ethiopia had severed ties with Israel around the time of the 1973 Yom KIppur War.

Bowing to realities, the Ethiopian government renewed its relationship with Israel on Nov. 3, 1989. On Nov. 5, Mengistu dispatched an aide, Kassa Kebede, to Jerusalem. A better emissary could not have been chosen. He spoke perfect Hebrew, having been educated at the Hebrew University, and understood that the Ethiopian Jews, known as the Beta Israel, could be the key to the survival of Mengistu's regime.

Kassa met with a variety of Israeli officials, from then prime minister Yitzhak Shamir to deputy foreign minister Benjamin Netanyahu. He offered Israel the renewal of strategic bonds and the use of a Red Sea island for defensive purposes. As well, he dangled another carrot, the immigration of between 500 to 1,000 Jews to Israel every month, all in exchange for Israeli military equipment and munitions.

There was only one problem. The United States, Israel's chief ally and benefactor, opposed the arrangement. Cognizant of Washington's attitude, Israel proposed economic and agricultural aid and medical assistance.

Nonetheless, Israeli arms reached Ethiopia. In February 1990, the New York Times reported that Ethiopia had received 150,000 bolt-action rifles from Israel, and in March, Ha'aretz disclosed that Israel was militarily involved in Ethiopia. Israel refused to confirm or deny that it was arming Ethiopia, a back-handed way of saying that the news reports were, in fact, accurate.

Uri Lubrani, who had served variously as Israel's ambassador to Ethiopia, Uganda and Iran, was put in charge of Beta Israel emigration. He knew Ethiopia well and still had friends there. Lubrani worked in concert with the newly appointed Israeli ambassador in Addis Ababa, Asher Naim.

Spector, a professor of English at the State University of New York Stony Brook, credits Susan Pollack, the resident director of the American Association for Ethiopian Jews in Addis Ababa, with having played a pivotal role in the success of Operation Solomon.

Pollack, who had worked on behalf of the Beta Israel since the early 1980s, convinced Lubrani that a gradual and orderly aliyah would be untenable. Having visited Beta Israel villages in the Gondar region and personally witnessed the diseases that were ravaging their ranks, she concluded that a swift operation was absolutely necessary. In the late autumn of 1990, Shamir gave Lubrani his approval to take dramatic steps to expedite the immigration of Ethiopian Jews to Israel.

The Israeli government, which in 1975 had granted them right to immigrate under the Law of Return, was certainly interested in "repatriating" them.

Menachem Begin, a former prime minister, had made Ethiopian aliyah a high Zionist priority. He had followed the lead of Israel's chief Ashkenazi rabbi, who had determined that the Ethiopian Jews were halachically Jewish. Before, Israel had been somewhat cool toward Ethiopian Jews. It feared that their departure might jeopardize its relations with Ethiopia's legendary ruler, Emperor Haile Selassie.

As Spector suggests, Operation Solomon could not have happened without the involvement of the United States. He writes: "Dedicated and effective officials at the U.S. embassy in Addis, the State Department and the National Security Council worked in virtual collegial harmony with the Israelis." Among these Americans were Bob Houdek, a diplomat at the U.S. embassy, and Senator Rudy Boschwitz, a Jewish refugee from Germany in 1938.

The levers of Operation Solomon were cranked into action on May 6, 1991 with the visit of Israel's deputy chief of staff, Gen. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, to Addis Ababa.

Mengistu threw a spanner into the works just two days later by demanding a payment of $180 million in U.S. currency. Lubrani was shocked. He had allocated upward of $12 million (US) for the mission. The Ethiopians came back with a counter-offer: $60 million. The Americans applied pressure on Mengistu to be reasonable, but to no avail.

After prolonged negotiations, both sides agreed on $35 million. It was a figure Houdek had originally suggested, Spector notes. That amounted to $2,446 for each Jew to be flown to Israel. Washington threw in an extra $13 million for the cost of the airlift.

As these machinations unfolded, the Jewish Agency activated 49 absorption centres to receive the Beta Israel and reserved over 250 buses to transport them from Ben-Gurion Airport to their new homes in Israel.

Meanwhile, the Israeli army assigned a squad of elite soldiers to secure Bole Airport, just outside Addis Ababa. They were also given the task of escorting the Beta Israel from the grounds of the Israeli embassy to the waiting aircraft.

The first Israeli plane bound for Addis Ababa, a turboprop-driven Hercules C-130 Rhino, lifted off before dawn on May 24. The flight plan called for the planes to reach their destination, 1,560 miles away, in five or six hours. The route took them southeast over the Red Sea, south across Eritrea and on to Addis Ababa.

Shahak's team set up a command post at Bole Airport. According to Spector, the Israeli army virtually assumed control of the airport on May 24. The rebels besieging Addis Ababa gave Israel 24 hours to complete the airlift.

Several minor glitches, described briefly by Spector, threatened to play havoc with the operation. But in the end, it went off smoothly. The first Israeli aircraft from Bole Airport landed in Israel that very afternoon. The arrivals were greeted by the prime minister, prominent politicians, including Ariel Sharon, and top brass from the army, notably Ehud Barak. News of the operation in Israel was censored. But the BBC World Service broke the story.

All in all, 41 military and El Al planes were used in the mission: 18 Hercules C-130s, 12 Boeing 707s, three 747s, five 767s and three 757s. One Ethiopian Airlines jet made a single round trip. Eight babies were born on the various flights.

Many Jews, particularly the Falash Mura, whose ancestors had converted to Christianity decades before, were left behind in Addis Ababa. Israel had decided to leave them out of Operation Solomon.

Powerful voices in Israel, including religious nationalists who saw them as a reservoir for populating settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, called for their inclusion in the airlift. Their views ultimately prevailed. In the past few years, thousands of Falash Mura have been resettled in Israel, and today, Ethiopian Jews, numbering some 94,000, comprise nearly two per cent of Israel's Jewish population.

Generous gifts announced for Tomorrow Campaign

Donors ensure success of new community campus in York Region

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

UJA Federation recently broke ground on the new state of the art, 50 acre, Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, where close to 300 community members and politicians gathered to honour Joseph and Wolf Lebovic for their continued philanthropic leadership. The generous lead gift provided by the brothers has inspired other community donors to support the project.

Honey and Barry Sherman have come forward with an unrestricted gift to the Tomorrow Campaign, chaired by Larry Tanenbaum and Gerald Schwartz, which is raising funds for the Lebovic Campus and two other Jewish campuses in the GTA.

Through a generous gift from the Kimel family, the Lebovic campus will become an internationally celebrated centre of Jewish education. Their gift will ensure the establishment of the Kimel Family Education Centre; the new home for the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) on the Lebovic Campus. The Kimel contribution is believed to be the largest ever designated for Jewish education in Canada.

"Our family saw a great need in the community," said Warren Kimel. "The Tomorrow Campaign provided the perfect vehicle for our family to make this important gift of quality education for the leaders of tomorrow."

A gift from Gerry Schwartz and Heather Reisman will ensure the building of the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, an exceptional cultural, social and recreational facility, also to be built on the Lebovic site.

"Only one generation ago, the creation of a Jewish campus in York Region was an improbable notion," said UJA Federation Board Chair Leslie Gales. "However, as our Jewish community continues to grow and expand, our visionary leaders realized that we needed a new way of doing business. The new Lebovic Campus is an historic undertaking that demonstrates our commitment to York Region's Jewish community as well as to the Greater Toronto Area."

This new facility will feature a diverse range of family and social services; fitness, sports and health programs; cultural agencies, plus facilities for child care, education, camping, conferences and meetings.

York Region, with a rapidly growing Jewish population of 60,000, represents the third largest Jewish community in Canada behind Toronto and Montreal.

It was history in the making!

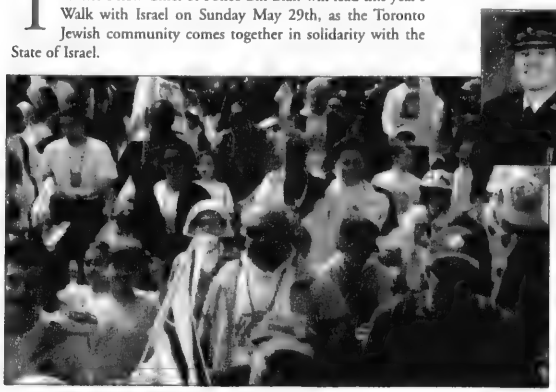
Toronto Police Chief to Lead Walk

Thousands expected on behalf of Israel

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

Toronto's new Chief of Police Bill Blair will lead this year's Walk with Israel on Sunday May 29th, as the Toronto Jewish community comes together in solidarity with the State of Israel.



Last year's Walk saw 15,000 members of the community join in solidarity with Israel (inset) Toronto's Chief of Police, Bill Blair will be leading this year's Walk.

Chief Blair received first-hand knowledge of Israel and the many challenges she faces when he recently participated in the Ontario Police Security Personnel Mission to Israel, sponsored in part by UJA Federation. Blair, who believes in diversity and tolerance, will be a valued guest at the Walk.

"I was honored to be asked to participate in the Walk with Israel and to be able to walk with the Jewish community," Blair explained. "This will be a great opportunity to meet with the Jewish community; for me to get to know them and for them to get to know more about me."

Walk registration begins at 9:30 a.m. at Coronation Park, Lakeshore and Strachan, southeast of the Princes' Gates. The Walk itself starts at 10:30 a.m., ending at Ontario Place with the RioCan Festival.

One member of the community who Chief Blair will meet is 87-year-old Rachel Kanner. This will be Kanner's 31st consecutive year at the Walk, where over the past three years she has raised several thousand dollars for Israel.

"For the last three years I reached the goal of being a Chai Walker [someone who raises $1,800]" Kanner said. "I hope to do the same this year."

Brothers Motek and Gregory Kanopny will also be out in full force at the Walk on Sunday and are willing to use their office supply business, Office Super Centre, to enlist more support from the community. With a booth at both Coronation Park and the RioCan Festival, the brothers will be handing out thousands of kits which will enable participants to register for prizes and raise money for Israel.

"With a special card enclosed in the kits, people can go online and register for the Win & Win contest, which makes them eligible to win one of three fantastic prizes from Sony," Motek explained. "But even more importantly, when a registrant orders online for the first time, 10% of the money they spend will go directly to UJA in the form of an Israel Bond. Every subsequent order will donate 5% to Israel Bonds which can then also be donated back to UJA."

Five hundred companies are involved in this project nationally and hundreds of thousands of dollars have been raised to purchase Israel Bonds. The brother's initiative is two years old and going strong.

"We are just really interested in helping the State of Israel and the Toronto Jewish community," Motek said. "This is a terrific way to do both."

For further information about how to get involved, visit the Walk website at www.ujawalkwithisrael.com

A Celebration of Survival

Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue played host to a special tribute to our community's Holocaust survivors last week on the 60th anniversary of their liberation.

"A Celebration of Survival" - chaired by Gerda Frieberg - featured a musical program highlighted by a number of well-known performers, including Jacques Israelievitch, Senya Trubashnik, and Cantor Benjamin Maissner.

A special presentation was made by renowned Toronto personalities Harvey Atkin and Marilyn Lightstone.

Ontario's Lieutenant Governor James K. Bartleman and Toronto Mayor David Miller also participated in the program.

The event - presented by the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto - celebrated the remarkable contributions of the survivors, despite having lived through the horrors of the Holocaust.

Standing ovation for George Will

Pulitzer prize winning columnist speaks at UJA Federation dinner

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA Federation

Combining the keen intellect of a university professor with the concise, clever language of a journalist, popular American columnist George Will received an enthusiastic reception last week from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's leading donors.

Will, the keynote speaker at the UJA Federation Top Gifts dinner, is, in fact, a commentator with strong academic and journalist credentials. After earning his doctorate at Princeton, Will once taught political philosophy at the University of Toronto, among other universities. Today, his twice-weekly newspaper column appears in nearly 500 publications.

In his remarks, Will heaped praised on Israel for its courage in combating terrorism and establishing a genuine democracy in just 57 years, in contrast to its neighbours.

"Israel was founded," he said, "on one, one-sixth of one percent of what is misleadingly called the 'Arab world', where there are 21 countries and not one democracy."

Then, using a series of one-liners, Will offered his own perspective on recent Middle East history.

- " Barak [former Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak] demonstrated that the most Israel could give is the least that Palestinians could accept."
- "The astonishing fact is that the great breakthrough to peace, if peace ever comes, is the death of a Nobel Peace Prize winner [Yassir Arafat]."
- "The hostility to Israel was not born in 1967 and will not be removed by a return to 1967 borders."
- "Israel is not being provocative. Israel's being is provocative to all of its enemies."

Will also called Saudi Arabia "a nation governed by 3,000 cousins," and included the country among many other nations which, he says, are "organized around antisemitism."

The dinner, chaired by Irving and Toddy Granovsky, was also an introduction to the upcoming UJA Federation Campaign 2006, which is being led by Warren Kimel and Honey Sherman.

"UJA Federation Campaign 2006 is about the future of Jewish youth and the future of Jewish life," said Sherman. "Our campaign is devoted to creating new opportunities for Jewish young people, whose needs have been overshadowed by the worldwide impact of Israel's emergency situations."

The campaign has already raised $11 million, before it even officially begins.

The dinner also featured outgoing UJA Federation Chair, Leslie Gales, who is completing her two year term to be replaced by David Engel.

Gales called the past two years "an arduous journey that has yielded remarkable results."

Chabad rabbi killed by GO train in auto accident

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It started out like any other morning for 25-year-old Rabbi Levi Bialo.

He got in his car to drive to Shacharit services at nearby Chabad of Markham synagogue, but he never got there.

Just after 7 a.m. on May 16 at a level crossing on Green Lane east of Bayview Avenue, his car was hit by a southbound GO train and dragged nearly 200 metres. Rabbi Bialo was pronounced dead at the scene.

Sgt. David Mitchell, who is in charge of York Regional Police's collision reconstruction unit, is leading the investigation of the accident. A reconstruction of the event was being carried out as this article was being written, but Mitchell said it appears that all of the crossing's safety equipment – including four sets of flashing lights, two control arms and warning bells – and the horn and bell of the train were working properly.

"The sun was coming up in the east, and was very bright," Mitchell said. "It appears that [Rabbi Bialo] was not wearing sunglasses, and that the sun visor of the car was not down."

The rabbi may have been blinded by the sun, or distracted by something, he said.

He saw the train coming, Mitchell said, and tried to avoid it. But when the hood of the car hit the control arm, the car was perfectly lined up with the path of the train.

Everything happened in a matter of a few seconds, Sgt. Mitchell said.

No one among the train's crew or its nearly 500 passengers were hurt, but many, especially crew members, were very upset by the accident, he said.

> 'For him, the performance of mitzvot was not an obligation, but rather an enthusiastic honour'

GO trains have video cameras mounted on their fronts and backs, and the films will be examined for more information. Also, police are conducting interviews with witnesses.

Rabbi Bialo's death stunned the community at Chabad of Markham, where he worked as a fifth grade teacher in its cheder, said the shul's spiritual leader, Rabbi Avraham Plotkin.

His special responsibility was working with young adults ages 18 to 26.

"He was very successful," said Rabbi Plotkin.

He described the young rabbi as "charismatic, an amazing communicator. He had a genuine, sincere faith in God, and was able to project that."

Rabbi Bialo's father-in-law Michael Konsker described him as sweet, sensitive and gentle.

"Nobody didn't like him," Konsker said. He had a great sense of humour and a sharp wit, he added. He loved sports, and liked to play basketball with the young people of the community.

Rabbi Bialo was the oldest of nine children in a close-knit Cleveland family. He married Torontonian Shira Konsker 2½ years ago, and the couple has a 15-month old son, with another child expected in the fall. About two years ago, he and his family moved here from New York City as a Lubavitch shaliach (emissary).

Goldie Plotkin, the rebbitzen of Chabad of Markham, said other shlichim are mourning him as one of their own.

"Shlichim all over the world are having special events in his memory."

Shul president Richard Steyn said that Rabbi Bialo's "special charges, the young adults of our community, were the recipients of his light, as he drew them into Judaism with honesty and companionship.

"For him, the performance of mitzvot was not an obligation, but rather an enthusiastic honour, and his passionate love of all things Jewish and of Jews infected all of us with that same passion."

Melinda Paiken, who with her family spent Rabbi Bialo's last Shabbat with him and his family, called him a "special angel." She was especially impressed with "his adoration and respect for Shira… He held on to her every word with love and affirmation."

The rabbi's sudden death has left his wife and child in serious financial straits. A Shira Bialo Relief Fund has been set up at the Toronto Dominion Bank, and donations can be made at any branch. Rabbi Plotkin also offered to forward any contributions sent via Chabad of Markham.

Rabbi Bialo is survived by his wife Shira, son Zalman, parents Shlomo and Gitty, and eight brothers and sisters.

Jewish Life

A subtle message

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Lag b'Omer, the 33rd day of the counting of the Omer stands as a unique day. On this day we change our usual solemn "Omer" behaviour by celebrating it as a holiday. Within a few short weeks, we will be celebrating the holiday of Shavuot, commemorating the revelation at Sinai and the receiving of the Torah. On their own, each of these days holds significance, but brought together they speak to us of focus and expression.

Lag b'Omer is the day on which we believe Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai and his son left the cave in which they had been hiding from the Romans for 13 years. With a death sentence pronounced against them, father and son had to live in isolation in order to survive. Tradition teaches that during these 13 years, Rabbi Shimon was writing the corpus of Jewish mysticism that became the central text of the Kabbalah.

Upon leaving the cave, the rabbi encountered people going about their daily lives. Some were tilling land while others were conducting business. The rabbi was appalled to see Jewish people neglecting their spirituality by filling their time with mundane matters. In fact, he was so appalled as to set fire to everything he saw with a mere glance. The Talmud then states that God admonished him for burning parts of the world and banished him and his son back to the cave for another 12 months.

Upon re-emerging from the cave, the rabbi meets an old man holding two myrtle branches and hurrying home to greet the Sabbath. When asked what the branches are for, the old man explains that they are for Shabbat. But why two, he is asked, and the man responds that one is for the commandment to "keep" the Sabbath while the second is to commemorate the commandment to "remember" the Sabbath. At that point, Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai tells his son to remember this moment and learn from it.

Receiving the Torah is a cause for celebration. Knowing what to do with it and how to implement it in the world is the challenge addressed by Lag b'Omer. If one is involved entirely in spiritual matters and explores only the wonders of Jewish mysticism, as Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai and his son did, a danger emerges. It is not the danger of misusing the secretive powers of the Kabbalah, rather it is the danger of viewing the whole and neglecting its parts.

By focusing on the mystical truths of the universe, Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai did not value the details of the universe. Tilling the soil involves us with God's creation and connects us with the Divine. Engaging in commerce builds our society into a healthy and respectful structure in which people are valued and useful. Again we are dealing with God's creations and are connected with the Divine. God personally admonishes the rabbi for destroying parts of creation and sends him back to refocus his knowledge.

It is the image of the old man who pays attention to expressing the details of the Torah that stands as the true lesson. While going about our daily routines, we must remember that it is often the subtleties of life that define the moment. Judaism is not the understanding of the grandeur of secret phrases and formulas, it is the recognition that God is in the details.

Celebrating Jewish mysticism

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

How can one day remind us of Judaism's links to mysticism, be a time to mourn and a time to dance, and also be an Israeli pilgrimage that is reminiscent at times of Woodstock?

Lag Ba'Omer, which begins on May 26, is all of those things. The seven-week period between Passover and Shavuot is a time of semi-mourning, but on the 33rd day, Lag Ba'Omer weddings are permitted and the day is celebrated with bonfires, parties and haircuts.

If Lag Ba'Omer is identified with one person, then it is Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai. He was a student of Rabbi Akiva, whose 24,000 students perished during the Roman conquest of Jerusalem 1,900 years ago because, as the Talmud tells us, "they did not show proper respect for each other." [www.ou.org/chagim/sefira/mystery.htm] Rabbi Shimon was one of the very few scholars to survive.

The Aish Hatorah website explains how Rabbi Shimon and his son sought refuge and studied Torah in a cave for 12 years. Rabbi Shimon is believed to have died on Lag Ba'Omer, but just before his death he revealed the Zohar, Judaism's great kabbalistic work to his students. Because of his legacy, Rabbi Shimon's yahrzeit has become a day of celebration. [http://tinyurl.com/e49mn]

One of the most popular Lag Ba'Omer traditions is to light bonfires. The Ohr Somayach site explains why: "On the day of Rabbi Shimon's passing, a great light was revealed to his students when he uncovered many of the hidden secrets of the Torah. This was written down in the Zohar. The bonfires symbolize the light of the hidden wisdom that Rabbi Shimon revealed on Lag Ba'Omer." [www.ohr.org.il/special/omer/light.htm]

Some of the biggest bonfires take place in Meron, a small town in northern Israel. Meron is believed to be the burial place of Rabbi Shimon, so every year it becomes the focus of a mass pilgrimage as tens of thousands of Jews come to celebrate and dance.

"Was this Meron or Woodstock," asked Judith Fein. "The town was like an Orthodox carnival. From makeshift booths, vendors sold crafts, religious objects, clothes, books, dates, nuts and soft drinks. Families camped out in tents. Men with long beards asked for charity or offered blessings.

"According to tradition, if a couple cannot conceive a child on Lag Ba'Omer, the man distributes drinks until he has served 18 bottles of wine to cure the barrenness. In the street, young men pressed glasses of wine on us. We drank, of course. It would be rude not to honor their desire for children." [http://tinyurl.com/87htb]

You can find another account of the trip to Meron at the Shema Yisrael site. [http://tinyurl.com/98qsy]

There are several great Lag Ba'Omer sites aimed at kids, such as the one from Jewish Theological Seminary. In addition to the history of the day, there are rabbinic tales and essays to spark discussions. [http://learn.jtsa.edu/topics/kids/together/lagbaomer/]

Over at Orthodox Union, there are links to a Lag Ba'Omer poem and an explanation why the day is associated with playing bows and arrows. [www.ou.org/chagim/lagbaomer/] And the National Jewish Committee on Scouting has created an entire bonfire lighting ceremony that focuses on the historical relationship Jews have had with fire [http://tinyurl.com/dp53q]

After you've been through those sites, you can test your knowledge with the Lag Ba'Omer quiz. [http://tinyurl.com/8dxe5]

For most Israelis, Lag Ba'Omer is a great day to get out, have a picnic and throw a few potatoes on the fire. Joni Schockett's menu is a bit more exotic. It includes Focaccia with Tomatoes, Feta and Garlic. [http://tinyurl.com/b836k] Daniel Rogov's picnic boasts Chicken and Artichoke Salad and Arak Cookies. [http://tinyurl.com/ 8zo6g] Over at KosherKorner, they're dining on Papaya Slaw and Sweet and Spicy Chicken with Tropical Fruits. [http://tinyurl.com/yv3tp]

While you're feasting at your picnic, why not break into a rendition of traditional tunes? Lag Ba'Omer songs may not be as famous as Pesach or Purim melodies but they do exist. So, if you really want to impress the folks over at the next bonfire, brush up on holiday songs from Tunisia, Greece, Iraq and Galicia. [http://jnul.huji.ac.il/dl/music/lagbaomer/]

Jewish Life

Longtime educator to make aliyah

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

By the end of this summer, the Toronto Jewish community's loss will be Israel's gain as Rabbi Howard Sacknovitz and his wife Esther fulfil their 36-year-old dream of making aliyah.

Rabbi Sacknovitz, a mainstay at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) – where he is now director of guidance – for more than three decades, said he is both excited and nervous to uproot himself from the city where he has spent most of his life.

"While it has always been a dream of ours [to make aliyah], once you get settled in a place, it's difficult to make that jump," he said.

"We're certainly excited and anxious because although we know Jerusalem and we know the life that we're going to, closing a home after 36 years and giving up residence and moving to another place is difficult – especially after spending it in an environment where I have been very, very happy, both at Shaarei Shomayim and at CHAT."

Rabbi Howard Sacknovitz

A big incentive to make the move is to be with his growing family. Both his daughters have made aliyah, and his son, who now lives in New York City, also plans to make the move in the future.

"We're not leaving because we have to leave. Things are really wonderful in Toronto. It is to concretize the dream we've had and to be with our children and grandchildren."

Rabbi Sacknovitz, who earned his smichah and master's degree in education from Yeshiva University in 1968, began his career at Shaarei Shomayim in 1969 as a youth educator before he got a job teaching at CHAT.

The shul is holding a tribute weekend in his honour, beginning this coming Shabbat, May 28, when there will be special services in the morning and Rabbi Sacknovitz will give a class in the afternoon.

"I wanted to summarize my being in Toronto by having a class that's going to deal with some of the things we've learned over the years."

The next night, on Sunday, the shul will host a dinner to celebrate Rabbi Sacknovitz and his contributions to the shul and the Jewish community.

"There will probably be a lot of speeches. It'll go with singing and dancing. It'll be a nice program. I'm looking forward to it," he said.

Rabbi Sacknovitz has mixed emotions about leaving a city that has been home for so many years for Jerusalem, the city where he has always longed to be.

"Toronto has a very vibrant Jewish community and there's a calmness to life here that is quite different to Israel. There's a vibrancy, obviously, to life in Israel, but there's a calmness here that makes it nice living in this type of environment," he said.

"We're going to Israel because metaphysically, emotionally, Jerusalem is where Jews belong. We were just there for Pesach, and there is a normalcy of observing holidays in Israel. In Toronto, we superimpose Pesach on the society around us. In Israel, it is so much more normal – holidays in general."

But he emphasized that the decision to leave had nothing to do with Toronto itself.

"We've been very happy in Toronto. We're not escaping anything, except maybe the weather," he said with a laugh.

"We've met a lot of friends, we've contributed, we felt, significantly to Shaarei Shomayim and to the city."

Rabbi Sacknovitz, who helped found and still leads Shaarei Shomayim's alternative downstairs Shabbat and Yom Tov minyan, said he is proud to be linked to a shul that shares his values.

"Shaarei Shomayim has been a home to us and we've associated ourselves with that shul because we believe strongly in the message that the shul stands for. Those would be messages of Zionism, how we relate to other Jews in society, how we relate to non-Jews in our society, how we relate to secular knowledge."

While he plans to focus more on his family when he moves to Israel, he still wants to educate others and himself.

"My goals are more personal and familial ones. My oldest daughter was married last year and now has a baby, my younger daughter is getting married this summer. It's time to reconnect with the family, to reconnect with my learning and get involved with some Jewish education component there."

Synagogue's USY chapter wins awards

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Shaar Shalom chapter of United Synagogue Youth (SSAUSY) was presented with two awards at the recent Eastern Canadian region USY's spring convention in Barrie, Ont.

Adam Goodman, SSAUSY adviser, said the chapter received a religious programming award in recognition of its Torah with Twist program, a discussion group with Cantor Ben Silverberg following Shabbat morning services, which addresses teen life issues.

More than 25 teens attend the monthly group, Goodman said, to talk about such things as body image, sexuality, drugs and alcohol, and homosexuality.

Also at the convention, the award of excellence was presented to chapter president Aaron Marmer, for the chapter's social and educational programs and for a fundraising event for Tikkun Olam, USY's charity.

The chapter was recognized as well for maintaining an innovative web site, (www.ssausy.org), sending a number of members to USY's international convention in Chicago and sending the largest delegation in the region to the spring convention.

"For a small synagogue, we have a group of dedicated teens who, in addition to social issues, are interested in learning about our religion," said Goodman, a student at Osgoode Hall Law School.

"It's been a great experience working with the kids, and it is exciting for them to be recognized for their work."

Reunion to unite Harbord's classes, '59 to '64

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Former students of Harbord Collegiate are holding a reunion for the graduating classes of the years 1959 to '64.

It takes place at the Miles Nadal JCC on May 28, and several teachers will be attending.

Until the end of the '50s, Harbord, in downtown Toronto, was a hub of Jewish life. The dawning of the '60s brought demographic changes and the families of Jewish immigrants began moving north.

In the '60s, the Jewish student population at Harbord Collegiate dropped to less than 50 per cent, whereas in previous decades, Jews had filled more than 90 per cent of its classes.

"We are planning a display of memorabilia and a spontaneous program with plenty of time to talk and to exchange stories," says Gary Posner, a chartered accountant and member of the reunion's organizing committee.

Posner notes that "doctors, lawyers, judges, politicians, media notables and many other successful professionals" attended Harbord in the late '50s and early '60s.

"I am sure we will have many good laughs" talking about the past, he says.

He recalled that it in 1964 the principal cancelled the longtime tradition of presenting a Christmas skit that mocked the teachers. "It was called off for being too distasteful and never presented again."

Posner remembers that once after football practice the team charged into the pool when the girls' synchronized swimming team was using it. "The boys were nude as they always swam nude."

He says that once when the Harbord Cadets put on an exhibition at the old armories, their commanding officer erred and gave them orders to march into a wall.

The Harbord reunion's organizing committee includes Posner, Helen Fisch (Brief), Alf Kwinter, Harvey Mandel, Paul O'Connell, Bo Lawrentiw, Dennis Shewchuk and Nestor Wolicki.

For more information or to make a reservation, e-mail harbord_reunion@ yahoo.com or call Shewchuk at 416-410-6110 or Gary Posner at 416-922-5959.

Centenarian's positive outlook stressed

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Centenarian Naomi Bogomolny is seen with her daughter, Edith Monson. [Cynthia Gasner photo]

On June 3, Bogomolny will celebrate her 100th birthday surrounded by more than 100 members of her family and friends.

Bogomolny was interviewed at her seniors residence, along with her daughter Edith Monson, an Ottawa artist who moved to Toronto six months ago. Monson's painting of her mother is also on the invitation.

"My mother is as sharp as ever," Monson says, although Bogomolny has some difficulty speaking since suffering a series of mini-strokes.

"My mother has a very optimistic outlook. She always taught her children that when you get up in the morning, 'you comb you hair, put on your lipstick, and you are prepared for anything throughout the day.' To this day, her appearance is still very important to her."

Recently, Bogomolny went to a dermatologist to have some marks removed from her face, saying that she wants to look nice at her 100th birthday. She notes that her dermatologist is Dr. Rochelle Mandelcorn Monson, her granddaughter-in-law.

Gold brought a rare humanity to resolving disputes

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The key to Alan B. Gold's success over his long, distinguished legal career was his ability to allow both sides to feel they had been treated fairly and could walk away with their dignity intact, Marc Gold said in eulogizing his father at a funeral attended by over a thousand last week. He died at age 87 on May 15.

Gold was chief justice of Quebec Superior Court from 1983 to 1992, the only Jew ever to occupy the position. But he was nationally known as the deft and determined mediator and arbitrator of strikes and other disputes involving the post office, the railways and airlines, the ports, the native peoples and other areas of the public and private sectors.

His most memorable and probably toughest assignment was mediating the Oka Crisis, the 78-day standoff among Mohawks, Quebec police and the army in 1990, a violent clash that attracted the world's attention.

As much as he loved the law, Gold did not hold any high-flown ideals about it, his son said. "The law was not something abstract to him, but a practical answer to human relationships and workable solutions to life's problems. Often he viewed it as the lesser of two evils in seeking justice in an imperfect world."

That he was trusted by all parties in often rancorous conflicts was his greatest pleasure, Marc said. The confidence placed in him stemmed from his genuine liking and interest in people, whoever they were, he said.

Gold is remembered for the skill and wisdom he brought to his profession, his down-to-earth, engaging personality and his realism about human nature and the way the world worked.

"He knew that life was not fair; therefore, he felt the obligation to treat people fairly. That was the golden thread that ran through his life," Marc said.

He treated everyone the same, no matter what their station, and had an intuitiveness that enabled him to understand people, Rabbi Reuben Poupko said. (Colleagues can attest to this; he frequently addressed them as "boychik" or some other affectionate nickname.)

A great believer in making the law accessible to all, Gold was a founder of the Legal Aid Bureau of Montreal in 1957. In his time off over the years, he quietly counselled those who could not otherwise afford a lawyer. His judgments were known for being understandable to the lay person, not just lawyers.

Marc described his father as "a very proud Jew" who conveyed Jewish values without labelling them as such to his three children.

Rabbi Poupko said "his life was a source of honour for every Jew in this city." Gold earned wide esteem in Quebec society, especially among francophones.

Former premier Lucien Bouchard, who attended the funeral, told The CJN that Gold, his law firm colleague for the past four years and next-door neighbour, was accepted by Quebecers as one of their own.

Gold, he said, achieved that rare thing in public life, especially one that was so long: he not only made no enemies, but no one had anything bad to say about him.

"He had a way of connecting with people, across all the lines. It was not possible to meet him without feeling an intimacy with him. He had an intelligence of the mind and of the heart," Bouchard said. "That's why he was so successful."

Bouchard particularly appreciated Gold's off-beat sense of humour. "You would ask him what the odds were on a case. He would go 'well, well,' be non-committal, then say, 'They are 60-40, but I don't know on what side.'"

Gold was born in Montreal in 1917 and spoke only Yiddish until age six. The family had a deep appreciation of language and culture, especially music, two passions that remained with Gold throughout his life.

McGill University's quota on Jews at the time almost thwarted Gold's ambition to be a lawyer. Instead, he went to Queen's University for his BA and earned a law degree cum laude from the Université de Montréal in 1941, an experience that made him comfortable in the francophone milieu. He then served in the Royal Canadian Artillery for four years.

Many years later, from 1978-82, he served as chair of McGill's board of governors, and was chancellor of Concordia University from 1987-92.

He received his first judicial appointment in 1961, becoming a district judge and first vice-chair of the Quebec Labour Relations Board. Four years later, he was appointed associate chief justice of the Provincial Court and, in 1970, chief judge of that body, which had been renamed the Court of Quebec.

From 1966-83, he was the chief arbitrator between the Quebec government and its employees, who were affiliated with one of the most militant unions on the continent.

After his retirement from the bench in 1992, Gold became a full-time mediator and arbitrator. He was also a senior counsel to Davies Ward Phillips & Vineberg.

In the '90s, he served voluntarily as president of the Jewish Public Establishments Commission, which represented the community health and social-service institutions to government.

Lawyer Ian Solloway, past president of the Lord Reading Law Society, described Gold as an "icon" of the profession. "He was tough as nails and had a mind like a steel-trap, yet was gentle at the same time. He was always a pleasure to be with, whether in court or socially. Just a terrific human being."

Gold received numerous national, provincial and city honours, as well as five honorary degrees and the Canadian Jewish community's highest citation, the Samuel Bronfman Medal.

Two years ago, on the occasion of the 60th anniversary of his admission to the Quebec Bar, his friends and colleagues created a scholarship fund in his name at the U of M law faculty. Gold's contribution to the justice system as well as to forging ties between diverse communities, unions and bosses, the native peoples and the Quebec government were recognized with that honour.

In addition to Marc, Gold is survived by his wife of 55 years, Lynn Lubin, and their children Nora and Daniel, and their families.

Friends of Bar-Ilan to mark school's 50th year

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

The Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University are setting forth to celebrate 50 years of achievement and contribution to the success of Israel's largest university.

The 140-acre campus with six faculties, 25 libraries, 130 laboratories, a student body of 33,000 and 59,000 alumni is touted as a school that has successfully balanced scientific research with Jewish studies.

"Bar-Ilan University is Israel's only institution of higher learning founded on the principle of integrating academic excellence with an appreciation of Jewish heritage. [It] is dedicated to fostering intellectual leadership, scientific progress and human values for the benefit of Israel, the world Jewish community and all humanity," states the school's official website.

Dov Altman, the national executive director of Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University (CFBIU), is part of a world-wide team that raises funds and awareness about the university in Ramat Gan and is proud of the contributions that Canadians have made in making it such a success.

Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies (BESA Center) was founded by Canadian Thomas Hecht. The gender studies program at Bar-Ilan, the only one of its kind in Israel, was also founded by Canadians, said Altman, as was the Cancer, Aids & Immunology Research Institute in Israel.

The CFBIU will participate in a trip to Israel, a Jubilee celebration, that is meant to be both educational and fun.

The trip will feature Bar-Ilan researchers who will guide participants through the Golan and Sinai. As well as celebrating 50 years of achievement, participants will also have the opportunity to study with Israel's best scholars and meet some of Israel's top leaders.

Bar-Ilan boasts a large Jewish studies program, which offers more than 1,000 courses, and it is the only university that requires students to minor in Jewish studies. The university has also garnered attention and acclaim for its work in nanotechnology (the science and technology of building electronic circuits and devices from single atoms and molecules).

"Bar-Ilan University is listed as number 13 in all of Europe in nanoscience literary citations," Altman said.

Because of this, the university has attracted more grants and funds to further research.

Altman said CFBIU was instrumental in building a university that has a student body that has grown by 90 per cent over the past 10 years.

Before the dream of creating a school that combined the latest in scientific technology with the richness of Jewish culture became a reality, Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, was skeptical that Torah and science could mix.

"Back in 1954, '55, Ben-Gurion said a school like that was unnecessary and that we should build a yeshiva instead. He said if the school could get 2,000 students, it would be a success," Altman said.

Today, Bar-Ilan is the largest university in Israel with the fastest growing PhD program.

Bar-Ilan also accommodates many Israeli Defence Forces (IDF) students, "which gives them the ability to do both [study and serve] without having to choose one over the other," he said.

But Altman said the mission of CFBIU is to unite Jews of all levels of observance and educate them about Jewish heritage.

"We are a Zionist university. We believe in a Jewish state, not just a democratic one."

He said that 60 per cent of the students are secular and the rest are religious and that the students are attracted to the university's focus on Jewish values.

"Bar-Ilan is the only university to teach the importance of a Jewish state and about what we've given to the world as Jews," he said.

"On campus, you see girls with mini-skirts and tank tops walking with women in full-length skirts, and men wearing kippahs walking with men who don't wear kippahs. The goal is to bring the two groups together and to create an understanding and respect for one another."

The Jubilee celebration takes place June 6-11. For more information, call 1-888-248-2720 or e-mail admin@cfbiu. org.

Alberta, Israel commit $1M each to water research

By NEIL LOOMER
Special to The CJN

EDMONTON — The Alberta government and the Jewish National Fund (JNF) have signed a memorandum of understanding to contribute $1 million each for research into the innovative design, construction and rehabilitation of water management and irrigation infrastructure.

In announcing the province's contribution at a meeting of JNF business leaders in Edmonton, Alberta Minister of Infrastructure and Transportation Lyle Oberg and Environment Minister Guy Boutilier heralded the deal as an important step in exchanging technology and other expertise between Alberta and Israel.

"Water is a precious resource for both Alberta and Israel," Oberg said. "This partnership establishes links between the two jurisdictions to share information, expertise and best practices related to water conservation and irrigation."

Oberg, who represents a riding in southern Alberta that has many of the same climatic conditions as Israel's Negev region, said there has been a drastic reduction in the flow of the Bow River in Alberta, and Israeli research and innovation can help with the irrigation problems affecting farmers and ranchers in the area.

Boutilier noted that knowledge gained through the partnership will be used to support Alberta's "Water for Life" water management program and to enhance provincial water infrastructure such as dams, canals and storage reservoirs.

Emphasizing the importance of water conservation to both jurisdictions, Boutilier said that in Alberta, water is referred to as "blue gold," while in Israel it's sometimes called "mayim shel zahav" (water of gold).

The University of Lethbridge's Water Institute for Semi-arid Ecosystems and the Alberta Irrigation Projects Association will partner in the initiative and carry out the research activities.

Avi Gafni, the co-ordinating researcher of the JNF Land Development Authority and a recognized expert in the de-salinization of land, will assist the province in renewing land that has been poisoned by salt deposits caused by years of bad irrigation techniques.

Gafni told the audience he is eager to do research in Alberta, which unlike Israel has vast areas of land available for research and experimentation.

The agreement was spearheaded by Rami Kleinmann, the JNF's emissary to the Prairies, who said JNF is looking "forward to sharing our 104 years of knowledge and experience with environmental issues – namely water, soil, and forestation – with the government and people of Alberta."

He said he plans to take Oberg, Boutilier, and representatives from their departments and the University of Lethbridge to Israel this fall for a first-hand visit to irrigation and de-salinization projects.

Bogomolny was born Naomi Bronstein in 1905 in Zvanetz, Bessarabia, then part of Russia. Aaron Bogomolny escaped Russia in 1922 and went to work as a salesman in Winnipeg. Five years later, he brought his bride and they were married.

They moved to Kapuskasing, Ont., where Aaron managed Bucovetsky's Department Store, now called Buc's. He went on to open a men's wear store and a restaurant.

Their three children, Nancy Levine, Monson and Hersh Bromley were born in Kapuskasing.

When the children were still young, the family moved to St. Catharines, where Bogomolny worked with her husband in their men's wear store, She became active in Hadassah-WIZO and served as chapter president in St. Catharines.

"My mother was very courageous," says Monson. "When she came to Kapuskasing, although she was in her mid-20s, she enrolled in Grade 1 to learn to read and write English."

That was the beginning of a self-taught education. Highly articulate and an avid reader of literature and poetry, she ultimately began writing for her own pleasure. Over the years, she has written poems, stories and greetings cards for family and friends.

Bogomolny's first published work appeared in the Kapuskasing daily. It was titled "Bottoms Up," and was followed by a poem, What's in a Greeting Card?

Aaron Bogomolny died 20 years ago. Two years later, Naomi moved to Toronto where she became active at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living participating in the literary groups where she wrote poetry.

Despite the fact that Bogomolny's speech has been affected, Monson notes that she has exceptional hearing and vision. "She can hear a tap leaking, and her doctor says that if she was driving, she wouldn't have her licence taken away because of her eyesight. And I believe she takes less pills than anyone else at Forest Hill Place."

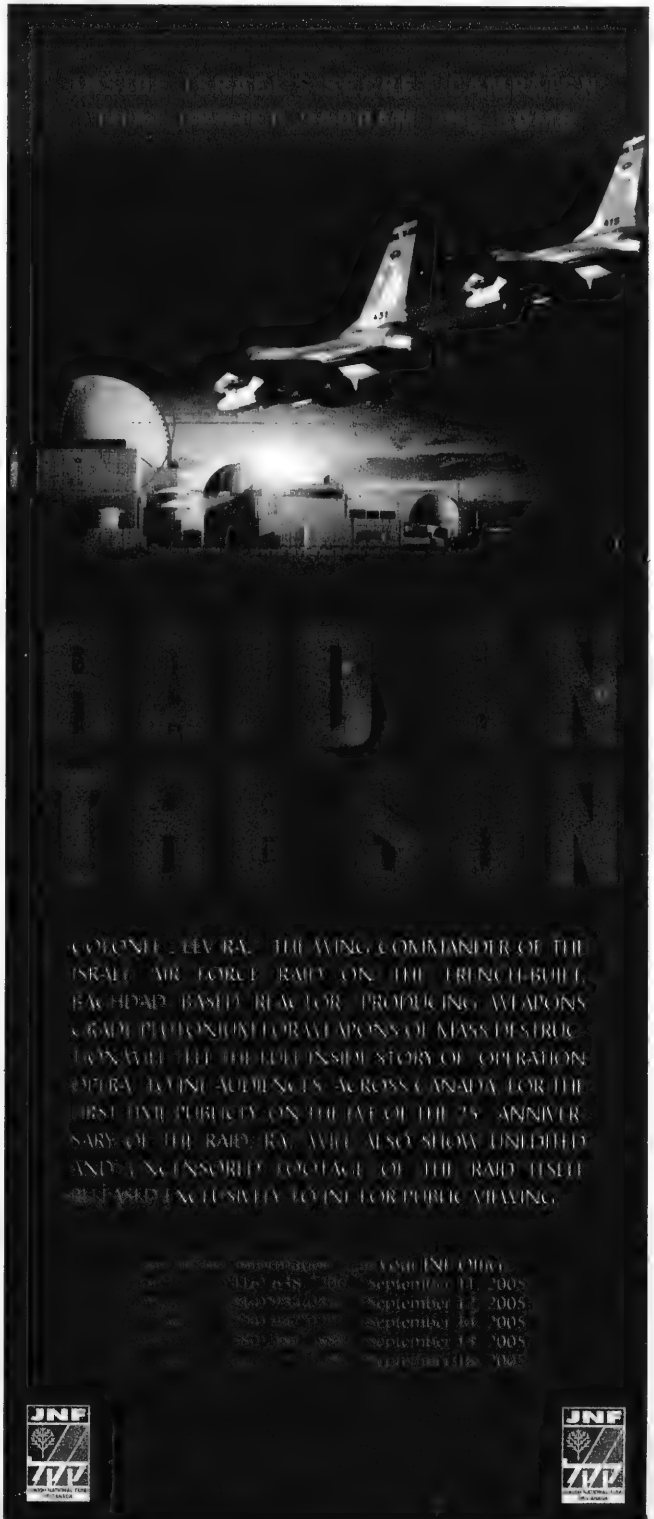
On the weekend of her 100th birthday, Bogomolny's great-granddaughter Hannah Simpson will celebrate her bat mitzvah. People will be coming from New York, Boston, St. Catharines and Ottawa for the weekend's celebrations.

At the party for the centenarian, four generations will be present. Her children, six grandchildren and their spouses, and 19 great-grandchildren will participate with speeches, songs and recitation of poems.

Until recently, Bogomolny has spoken at all family simchahs.

Quoting from her poem What's in a Greeting Card?, Bogomolny concludes, "Yes, it's just a piece of paper,/ And it costs no big amount,/ But it proves that old, old saying,/ 'It's all the little things that count.'"

It is this philosophy that has made Naomi Bogomolny's 100 years full of joy and gratitude.



Coast to Coast

Some truths are not so pleasant

In his May 2 article in the Jerusalem Report, "Fair Game, Then and Now," Moshe Negbi, legal commentator for Israel Radio and a columnist for the Report, wrote about the absence of law and order that prevails in some areas of the West Bank.

The problem is particularly egregious around the two cities of Nablus and Hebron, where small groups of radical Jewish settlers have allegedly engaged in what he termed "violent harassment" of their Palestinian neighbours, and of "the failure of the army, police and judicial authorities to deal with them."

This is a topic that has received a substantial amount of Israeli media attention, but also some foreign media coverage as well.

On May 11, the CBC's Adrienne Arsenault did a story from the Palestinian village of Tuwani, near Hebron, where sheep have become sick or died from poison that had been spread on their fields. The villagers claim the poison was placed there by Israeli settlers. The settlers deny any involvement.

Arsenault reported: "[Palestinian] villagers are so sure it was the Jewish settlers… because it fits an old pattern of abuse and violence in the Hebron hills. These are hardly comfortable neighbours. Blood has been spilled on both sides. [The] problem [is] so acute the Israeli police now escort Tuwani's children to school after the kids were attacked by settlers… International and Israeli activists now roam these fields to act as watchers and shields for the farmers."

Some media monitoring organizations and individuals in Canada took strong exception with Arsenault for doing this story when there have been no arrests or firm determination of who was responsible for the poisoning.

However, Negbi, who also teaches constitutional and media law at Hebrew University, said in a telephone conversation: "In my view there doesn't have to be absolute evidence, only reasonable ground for doing this story." He referred to the prima facie evidence, including a pattern of behaviour of intimidation and harassment that appears in this case.

Arnon Regular, who covers the territories for Ha'aretz, said in conversation that the CBC story was not only valid, it was important. He added: "I was told by a police officer in the Hebron area that there is no doubt in their minds that the settlers are involved, even though they have problems catching the people responsible."

The "problem" is that it appears that the Israeli authorities – the police – are unable to handle and properly investigate the complaints by the Palestinians.

Both Regular and Negbi explained that only a very small number of settlers are involved in the attacks and intimidation, a point Arsenault should have emphasized. These are people living mostly in outposts considered illegal by Israeli law and who have been in constant friction, some of it violent, with nearby Palestinian farmers whose land claims they do not recognize.

Yet another Israeli journalist, Oni Yablonka of Ma'ariv, wrote (May 6) that "the number of violent incidents by settlers against Palestinians and [Israeli] forces has risen sharply by 52 per cent, as indicated by Samaria and Judea District Police data. From the beginning of January 2005 and until the end of April, 265 files against settlers were opened for alleged disturbances and violence of varying degrees towards Arabs, soldiers and police. In comparison, in the same period last year, only 174 files were opened against settlers."

Yablonka cited the Settlers Council reply: "We do not justify violence of any sort, and if the data indicate anything concrete, then it is ugly and contrary to Judaism and our strong tradition."

There are occasions when media items about Israel may make us uncomfortable and lead us to an immediate reaction of denial. We must recognize, however, that it is not journalistically irresponsible for reporters to deal with unpleasant truths. Quite the contrary, in fact. What we must guard against are the genuine distortions of reality that are indeed inimical towards Israel. Attacks on fair media stories diminish our credibility when we need to take issue with coverage that is anything but fair.

Israel offers conciliatory gestures to PA

They also opened light arms fire. Following an exchange of gunfire with IDF troops securing the area, one of the militants was killed. The other two, one of whom was wounded in the gun battle, escaped.

The mortar fire was intended as a diversion tactic to cover the Palestinians approaching the settlement and firing anti-tank missiles, military sources said. The militants were also seen with a bomb that had not been detonated.

Palestinians also fired at least 10 mortar shells at settlements and IDF posts overnight throughout the Gaza Strip, Israel Radio reported.

Despite the continued barrage of mortar shells and rockets, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz approved a series of gestures to the Palestinians, over the objections of the Shin Bet security service.

Shin Bet Chief Yuval Diskin opposed the proposal to approve the gestures, on the grounds that there are too many warnings of terror attacks. But the IDF supported the decision. At a meeting with Mofaz, senior officers warned that if Israel did not act to strengthen Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas, "he'll fall, and then we'll have to give more abatements to Hamas, which will gain power in his stead."

The measures, which will be brought to the cabinet for approval after Sharon returns from the United States later this month, involve steps that Israel originally promised at February's Sharm el-Sheikh summit: freeing an additional 400 Palestinian prisoners, allowing the return of wanted Palestinians deported to Europe following the standoff at Bethlehem's Church of the Nativity in 2002, and allowing the return of Palestinians deported from the West Bank to Gaza.

The U.S. security co-ordinator, Gen. William Ward, had pressured Israel to take these steps in recent days. "You complain that the Palestinians are not fulfilling their commitments," he told his Israeli interlocutors. "But what about your commitments?"

The decision to approve these steps now is also related to Abbas' planned visit to Washington this week. Thereby, Sharon hopes to deflect Abbas' expected complaint to U.S. President George W. Bush that Israel is not helping him.

Sharon approved the gestures despite the ongoing escalation in Gaza. Palestinians fired at least 14 mortars at the Gush Katif settlements last Thursday, and four Qassam rockets landed in Israel – including one in the courtyard of Sderot's municipal offices. The shelling caused property damage but no casualties. Palestinians also shot at IDF troops in Gaza and launched anti-tank missiles at the troops.

The IDF did not respond to the shelling, even though the government has authorized it to respond to mortar and rocket launches, particularly if Hamas seems to be trying to cause escalation. Israeli intelligence believes that while Hamas does want some escalation in the run-up to new local elections in Rafah, it also does not want the ceasefire to collapse. Last Thursday's shelling, therefore, was not carried out by Hamas, but by other Palestinian factions – primarily the Popular Resistance Committees, a Fatah breakaway, and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

It is possible that Hamas is financing, or even giving orders for, shelling by other groups, army sources added, but Hamas leaders seem to want to end the current round of violence – which is why Israel responded to the shelling mainly with threats rather than action. Hamas did not even attack, as the IDF had expected it would, when a Hamas operative wounded in an IDF air strike died of his wounds.

Despite the Gaza escalation, the IDF believes that abatements should continue in the West Bank, because the PA has begun security co-ordination with Israel – albeit not against the terrorist organizations. The army proposes removing roadblocks and allowing more West Bank residents to work in Israel. It also recommends preparing to hand Qalqilyah over to the PA once the latter makes progress on collecting weapons from wanted men in the two cities it already controls, Jericho and Tul Karm.

Sharon's adviser Dov Weissglas met with Palestinian minister Saeb Erekat and called for an immediate halt to shelling attacks by Palestinian militants.

Weissglas warned Erekat that if the Palestinians continue shelling Israeli targets in and around the Gaza Strip, the Israel Defence Forces will respond harshly.

Palestinian sources said Weissglas told Erekat, however, that the IDF won't escalate the fighting in the Gaza Strip.

The two also agreed in principle to a June meeting between Sharon and Abbas.

Uzbek Jews feeling scared but safe, say leaders

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Jewish leaders in Uzbekistan say members of their community feel safe and that no Jews have been hurt in recent unrest that has hit parts of the country.

But speaking off the record, some Jews told JTA that Jews could begin leaving Uzbekistan later this year if the situation continues to deteriorate.

In an interview published earlier this month, Uzbekistan's main Jewish religious authority said it was business as usual for his community, and he condemned those responsible for anti-government protests in the Central Asian nation of 26 million.

"The Jewish community of Tashkent and other cities continues to live a normal life," David Gurevich, a Chabad emissary and chief rabbi of Uzbekistan, was quoted as saying by AEN, a Russian Jewish news agency affiliated with the Chabad-led Federation of Jewish Communities, a leading sponsor of Jewish life in Central Asia.

"The Jewish community condemns any disorders against the existing authorities," he added.

Violence erupted earlier this month in the eastern city of Andijan when armed men stormed a jail and took control of the local administration building. The rebels were joined by thousands of people who took to the streets to protest the trial of 23 local businessmen on charges of Islamic extremism and to complain about poverty and unemployment.

Government authorities blamed the turmoil on radical Islamic groups, and troops opened fire on the crowd.

Uzbek authorities said soldiers shot only at gunmen from a radical Islamist group, but later added that more than 150 people had been killed. Opposition sources said the death toll was closer to 800.

The unrest later spread to the eastern border town of Korasuv, where locals seized control of government buildings Saturday.

Andijan, where the turmoil started, is home to some 500 Jews, Gurevich said.

"No members of the Jewish community took part in the unrest," said the rabbi, adding that the small synagogue in Andijan remained open.

A Moscow-based Jewish official said his organization has been in touch with the Uzbek Jewish community and that there had been no calls for urgent help.

"There is a certain sense of stability now after what happened in Uzbekistan, and although I don't think this will last long, at this point there is absolutely no panic or sense of urgency within the community," said Roman Spektor, a spokesperson for the Moscow office of the Euro-Asian Jewish Congress.

Nearly 90 per cent of Uzbekistan's estimated 20,000 Jews live in Tashkent, the capital, which has not been hit by protests.

"In Tashkent, everything is quiet, as if nothing is happening anywhere in the country," a Jewish activist, who asked not to be identified, told JTA last week in a telephone interview from the Uzbek capital.

"When the government point of view dominates the press and airwaves here, we don't even know exactly what is going on," the activist said. "Rumours seem to be the most reliable source of information."

The Federation of Jewish Communities, which operates synagogues and day schools across the former Soviet Union, said it will increase the budget for Uzbekistan to make sure the Jewish community has enough security.

"We are sending them additional funds to set up more armed guards around schools," said Avraham Berkowitz, the federation's Moscow-based executive director. "They are actually in a lot of fear, but the leaders of the community are trying to calm down the people."

Since independence in 1991, Uzbekistan has been ruled by autocrat Islam Karimov. Despite his increasingly poor record on human rights and democratic issues, Karimov has earned a reputation in the United States as a leader able to keep a tight rein on Islamic fundamentalists in an area plagued by radical and separatist trends.

Apparently as part of his campaign to please the West, Karimov has made many overtures to the Jewish community, allowing Jews to open synagogues, schools and charitable centers.

"Karimov's government has always been very helpful to the Jewish community, allowing Jews to practise freely, to be public, to educate their children," Berkowitz said.

A Moscow Jewish woman who has family in Uzbekistan said she urged her relatives to pack up and leave as soon as they can.

"I called my sister in Tashkent the day it all began," said Mira Rivlina, a pediatrician. "I asked her what else needs to happen to make her understand she doesn't have to sit there any more. But you know, she has family, two kids, and it's hard to make a quick decision unless someone breaks into your own apartment one day."

While there's now no indication that Uzbek Jews are planning to leave, "if the situation drags on for months, we can expect more people will go on aliyah or move to Russia," Berkowitz said.

Brief history of Uzbek Jewry

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — A large indigenous Jewish community – known as Bukharan Jews, after the Uzbek city of Bukhara – lived in what is now Uzbekistan for many centuries, involved in crafts and local and international trade.

Beginning in the late 19th century, when the region fell under the Russian influence, Ashkenazi Jews from the European sections of Russia also settled in the region. Many were engineers, doctors or lawyers, and they provided the area's first generation of local intelligentsia.

After the advent of Communism and its war on religion, Jews in Uzbekistan, like those in the other remote parts of the Soviet Union, found it easier to keep their traditions alive than did Jews in the European part of the Bolshevik empire. There, Jewish religion and traditions were subject to persecution.

Many religiously observant Jewish families took advantage of the area's relative religious freedom, living Jewish lives and educating their children in Judaism. That was particularly true of the Lubavitch Chassidim, who came to the area both before and after World War II, either because they had been sent into exile or because they had fled there to avoid Communist repression.

The community grew substantially during World War II with the arrival of thousands of Ashkenazi Jewish refugees and evacuees from Nazi-occupied parts of the Soviet Union. The two communities, Bukharan and Ashkenazi, still retain their distinctive features, and they rarely intermarry.

Most Bukharan Jews, who value the tradition of living as extended families, emigrated to Israel or the United States in the 1970s and in the years following the collapse of Communism in 1991.

Tourism to Israel up 25%

Newly released figures show that 373,000 tourists arrived in Israel in the first quarter of 2005, a 25 per cent jump over the comparable quarter in 2004. The increase exceeded expectations and paves the way for Israel to welcome 1.8 million tourists in 2005, according to Israeli Tourism Minister Abraham Hirchson, who encouraged airlines to lower airfares and provide more passenger seats.

Settlers given deadline

The Israeli government gave Gaza settlers a week to accept a special relocation deal. Justice Minister Tzipi Livni told an inter-ministerial committee that 426 settler families, roughly a third of those to be evacuated from Gaza this summer, have signed up to move to Nitzanim, a few miles north along the coast. She warned the rest of the settlers that if they don't do the same within a week, they could lose such privileges as priority housing and choice of schools for their children. "Time is very short and the settlers must understand that if they don't give us a green light very soon, we will be unable to put these solutions at their disposal," she said.

PA pulls* Protocols

The Palestinian Authority pulled a link to the Protocols of the Elders of Zion from one of its websites. The move came after the Anti-Defamation League wrote the PA demanding that it remove the link from its site. As part of the "road map" peace plan, the Palestinians have pledged to stop inciting against Israel, but Israeli officials contend that changes are not coming fast enough. But PA Information Minister Nabil Sha'ath said he ordered the suspension of Sheik Ibrahim Mdaires, a Gaza Strip imam who told his congregation last week that "Jews are a virus resembling AIDS."

Soldier jailed for shooting

An Israeli soldier was sentenced to jail for shooting an unarmed Palestinian. The conscript, who shot a Gaza Strip resident in the leg as he was installing a TV antenna in 2003, was found guilty of grievous bodily harm last week and sentenced to 20 months in jail. He was also found to have lied to investigators and was demoted from sergeant to private. Two Israeli border police officers were jailed for eight months after being found guilty of abusing Palestinians at a checkpoint.

Jewish Agency candidate

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's candidate for the next chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel received preliminary approval. The Jewish Agency's advice and consent committee unanimously approved Ze'ev Bielski, mayor of Ra'anana, as the candidate for the JAFI chairmanship. Bielski is expected to be approved in late June. He would succeed current JAFI chairman Sallai Meridor, who resigned from the post last week.

Former Toronto rabbi speaks in Tehran

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In 1993, Rabbi Lawrence Troster moved from Toronto to New Jersey, where he has been based ever since. Earlier this month, he embarked on a much less likely journey: a quick trip to Tehran for a two-day environmental conference.

Rabbi Troster – the rabbinic fellow at the Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life and a participant in the Interfaith Partnership for the Environment of UNEP (United Nations Environment Program) – was the only rabbi among 50 invited guests to the International Conference on Environment, Peace and the Dialogue Among Civilizations and Cultures. The event was co-sponsored by UNEP and the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Although he admits to having had some doubts about accepting the invitation, the Canadian-born rabbi – who served at Shaareh Haim Synagogue in Richmond Hill (now known in its more recent incarnation as Beit Rayim) and then Beth Tzedec Congregation – felt a responsibility to go, and he said he is glad he went.

"One of the reasons I'm in this work is that I feel it's one of the most critical issues that faces humanity," he said in a telephone interview. "I think our tradition has a lot to say [about environmental issues]."

As well, Rabbi Troster said, although "the [Iranian] government is not doing everything we particularly like," there are moderates within the government who are trying to keep connected to the rest of the world.

The fact he is a rabbi was no secret to the 70 participants from more than 30 countries, as well as about 100 local participants. Among them were university students and professors, ministers of the environment, ambassadors, non-governmental organizations and representatives of the world's major religions.

"People were quite interested to talk to me," Rabbi Troster said. Among them was an Iranian American who grew up during the revolution in Iran, and who had had many Jewish friends in high school. "Especially in Tehran they know about Jewish people."

In a paper Rabbi Troster presented on "Environmentalism as the Foundation of Dialogue between Civilizations," he talked about the Jewish philosopher Maimonides, the Jewish concept of tzedek, and related Torah laws such as letting the land lie fallow every seven years.

"I never felt any hostility [at the conference]," he told the Jewish Telegraphic Agency on his return. "And nobody asked me about Israel."

The environment can be "a good way of bringing together people who usually face off on opposite sides of issues," he added.

The connection between security, peace issues and the environment is very important, said Rabbi Troster. Issues addressed at the conference included the impact of war on the environment, such as the health problems caused by depleted uranium weapons that poison ground water.

Nonetheless, the rabbi remains optimistic that "if humanity really wants, it can solve this problem."

The conference put together a document, the Tehran Communique, that will be submitted to the United Nations and delivered to the Millenium Review Summit, a large-scale event the United Nations is planning for September.

The rabbi's brief trip and the busy conference agenda left him no time to meet the local Jewish community. He did, however, see two Chassidim, fresh from a meeting with the country's president, Mohammad Khatami.

Rabbi Troster quickly realized that they were members of the anti-Zionist Satmar sect.

"They weren't participating in the conference, but they were welcome because they were anti-Zionist," he told JTA. "It was the last place I expected to see a Chassid, but you never know who you are going to run into at these things."

SPAMEDICA: Dr. Stephen Mulholland, cosmetic surgeon for SpaMedica, recently appeared on the Today Show with Katie Kuric and Matt Laur to speak to an audience of more than 50 million people. You might ask yourself why a Canadian plastic surgeon is receiving so much attention? The answer is ThreadLiftT.

Clinique: Overflowing with bronze tones

ThreadLiftT is a non-incisional, minimally invasive, suture-based facelift that has been developed, pioneered and championed by Mulholland over the past four years. Mulholland, one of Canada's most recognized and respected cosmetic plastic surgeons, has recently expanded his Los Angeles-based offices to address the tremendous demand for his ThreadLiftT procedure. The procedure has been known to make patients look up to 15 years younger!

Mulholland has some bold things to say about his procedure and has trained over 300 U.S. physicians to perform his technique. "The ThreadLiftT is a wonderful procedure – 70 to 90 per cent of a facelift effect in less than two hours, with no cuts, scars or general anesthetic, which is why the ThreadLiftT has become so popular," he says. "The procedure has minimal recovery, and unlike Botox and fillers, you do not need to keep coming back as the lift effects last for three to five years."

MAURICE FIORIO: For hair this summer, looks are soft, flowing, natural and easy to style. Natural is where it's at for cut and colour. Tone on tone colour creates natural-looking, shiny, bright hair. Warm tones enhance this. Wash'n'go styles created by texturizing the hair create movement, volume and softness.

Styling is scrunch dried to enhance curl and to create texture and softness. Revlon Professional's Equave 2Phase conditioners are a great way to minimize hair damage caused by the ever increasing sunlight! The spray-on, leave-in conditioners come in two formulas – one for extra dry and one for volume. Both sprays have UVA and UVB filters.

Come in to Fiorio and treat yourself to Flash Soleil – a hydrating self-tanning treatment that provides overall exfoliation in a tanning cream without the harmful rays of the sun (includes a smoothing hydrating scrub and a self-tanning massage for face and body). Or, to get your face back in order after a long winter, try the Escale Beauté beauty break facial – a complete, short and sweet facial treatment.

CAROL'S TIPS

SKIN CARE: Estee Lauder introduces Re-Nutriv Revitalizing Comfort Crème that uses advanced anti-aging technologies to restore vitality to the skin and reduce fine lines and wrinkles.

Shiseido introduces the Essential Steps to Amazing Skin at any age, an advanced skincare concept that will change the way you think about caring for your skin. Shiseido is now offering a new starter kit for each skin type that includes the products needed to cleanse, soften and moisturize your skin – the three universal truths of skincare.

Skin Smoother Pore Minimizing Makeup by Clinique creates a comfortable, smooth canvas on skin, diminishing the look of visible pores immediately. This oil-free formula is airy and transforms into a powdery, silky finish.

Lancaster introduces the Revolcanic deep moisturizing cream for dry to very dry skin. It works to help maintain skin hydration and to restore skin suppleness and density.

Dermaglow's Butter Miracle Replenishing Body Cream replenishes and hydrates skin from top to bottom making it feel smooth and silky.

SPA: DermaGlow, the creators of NuVectin advanced wrinkle treatment and their fabulous Lip Plumper, is now treating us with their brand new Eye Therapy – just great!

or acne-prone skin, Body SPF 15 Gel Sunscreen by Clinique provides protection from damaging UVA/UVB rays in a light, oil-free, water-resistant formula that instantly absorbs.

Introducing Biotherm's new slimming innovation! Expert in body care, Biotherm brings you Drain'Choc, a slimming, anti-water retention body concentrate that contours the body and improves skin quality; Celluli-Choc to help stimulate the elimination of stored fats and transform and refine skin texture to look and feel softer; and Abdo-Choc, which helps eliminate fat and has an anti-storage agent that helps prevent the storage of excess sugars, ensuring a firm and toned stomach. Don't miss it!

Also from Biotherm, Age Fitness Power 2 has high-performance olive tree extracts that work to combat the first signs of aging and increase skin fitness.

Lancôme introduces Rénergie Microlift, a new cream that produces "microlifters," which work on different points of the face to give a lifting effect. More natural and replumped facial curves look as if they have been remodelled to defy the laws of gravity.

For younger, healthier looking skin, L'Oréal introduces ReNoviste, a revolutionary glycolic peel system that is easy to use and enhances the natural production of collagen and elastin. In only five minutes, the three-step ReNoviste system erases the effects of time! L'Oréal Paris launches Perfectslim Day and Night. Perfectslim Day contributes to the elimination of fat. Perfectslim Night combats excessive fat accumulation while you sleep – just fabulous!

Forget about the high heel crunch with new Airplus for her. These fascinating clear gel insoles are life savers! The gel Arch Support and Hug My Heels Liners are quite the crowd pleaser, and there is something for everyone.

Perfectslim from L'Oréal.

HAIR: To complete its exceptional line of products for coloured hair, L'Oreal Professionnel is launching the vitamino colour protection cream from Serie Expert. This quick and easy to use product controls and nourishes the hair fibre and protects coloured hair, leaving it shiny and soft.

Clairol and Pantene Pro-V Colour Expressions help you express your colorful style. Clairol's Nice 'n Easy Root Touch Up allows you to blend in root re-growth in just 10 minutes! Pantene Pro-V Color Expressions is the answer for everyday colour maintenance, whether you have blonde, brunette or red hair, with its complete line of shampoos, conditioners, treatments and styling products.

This summer, the focus is on natural beauty! Earthy, tropical and exotic, Goody Products Summer 2005 Naturals Collection offers a selection of beautiful hair accessories that make you look stylish.

FOUNDATION: Clinique's True Bronze Summer Trend Collection 2005 is overflowing with bronze tones. Bronzers including the new True Bronze Pressed Powder Bronzer and Loose Powder Bronzer add an all-over bronze shimmer, while the new Bronzing Gel enhances the face with an ultra-sheer amber glow.

Chanel makes it easy to have a healthy summer glow with The Voile Universel/Ultra Sheer Makeup that is featherlight and glides on easily. It features sun protection with an SPF 15, vitamin E, vitamin A and vitamin F.

The latest concealer from Smashbox Cosmetics hides uneven skin tones, under-eye circles and unwanted shine – a perfect base for foundation.

Simply striking describes the new Amber Bronze Sienna Earth Powder by Estee Lauder. This bronzing compact is speckled with layers of bronze shades to form a powder – you'll almost want to admire it rather than use it!

BLUSH: Estee Lauder introduces the New Limited-Edition Extravagant Bright Blush Petals, an innovative blushing concept featuring a mélange of loose pink, lavender and silver blush "petals," artfully positioned around a white flower-pressed pan centre that serves as an all-over face highlighter.

MAC says that cheeks need to be rouged, but not traditionally. Instead use creamy soft-shine shades of the new vibrantly coloured Blushcreme.

EYES: Introducing three new vibrant and undoubtedly feminine shades of Couleur Folle Loose Powder Eye Shadow by Lise Watier. The new shades include Folie Orange, Folie d'Amour (fuchsia) and Folie Soleil (golden yellow). Cast a look of a thousand luminous rays with Gold, the latest shade of Eye Shine Metallic Eyeliner by Lise Watier.

Estee Lauder brings an Illusionist Waterproof Maximum Curling Mascara that gives lashes dramatic curl and lift, a Pure Color Liquid Eyeliner to add some flirtatious drama to your eyes, and the New Limited-Edition Pure Color Eye Shadow Duos in Lilac Kaleidoscope and Yellow Kaleidoscope that delivers a silky, high-impact color.

MAC introduces lids that shimmer in Illicit Iced Absinthe and Outre Orange. On the eyes, a singular line of beauty is needed, as silky deep Forest Green Fluidline becomes "the new black" for underscoring and adding drama.

LIPS: The universe of Chanel Beauté explodes this summer with two new product introductions,

Cristalle Gloss Waterlight Lip Gloss and Le Crayon Gloss Sheer Lip Colouring Pencil, which ensure a splash of summer-perfect lips. Just to add to this, Chanel has introduced Sugar Gloss and Abricot Gloss for candy pink nails.

Skin Loving Colors by Biotherm introduces Aquatic Shine Glossy Lipstick Intense Moisturization. Aquatic Shine is a meltingly soft, moisturizing lipstick that gives your lips a luscious glow with all the incredible shine of a gloss.

Rouge Gourmand by Lise Watier invites you to discover its two new, refreshing lipstick shades that are simply bursting with vitality – Papaya and Pasteque (Watermelon). Their hydrating formula nourishes the lips, helping to restore softness. What's more, Rouge Gourmand features Maxi-Lip, a magic ingredient that stimulates collagen production for lips as juicy and inviting as tropical fruit!

Lips are idealized with lipsticks and lipglass by MAC in siesta bronzes, spiced browns and vintage-influenced smoked salmons.

Film looks at education in Israel and the West Bank

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

When educators talk about their school's culture, they are usually referring to pre-approved mission statements carefully honed by trained administrators. In public, they are happy to discuss official curricula, carefully reviewed teacher training programs, and the significance, or insignificance, of their dress codes.

Yet, students are often more affected by the unofficial culture of the school, the learning that isn't recorded in schoolbooks and approved curriculum. Many a filmmaker, and parent, would cherish the opportunity to capture the discussions that take place in school staff rooms, beside teenage lockers or inside the caretaker's office.

Lessons in Fear, a feature documentary film produced by James Cullingham and co-produced by Igal Hecht, explores the official and hidden curricula behind the education of Israeli and Palestinian students. As the narrative progresses, the camera slowly reveals how the conflict is presented to children on both sides of the divide through the teachings of educators and the observations of their students.

One of the teachers portrayed is third-generation kibbutznik Mahal Arel. Her perception of Israeli history is presented to her high school class through formal question and answers. Arel asks her students to think about whether it was necessary to take away basic rights from the Arab population in Israel between 1948 and 1967. Her students discuss the balance between security for their country against terrorism and the consequential impact on the Arabs inside Israel and on the West Bank and Gaza.

But Mahal also wonders how far she can push her students. In an environment where suicide bombings are a fact of life, can she teach her students about the similarities between the Palestinian and Jewish people? Can she show them that, like the Jews before the State of Israel, the Palestinians are now not wanted by anyone and are forced to live in ghettoized communities? Mahal wonders if she can tell her students, in good conscience, that once they have a state, Palestinians will live with Israelis in peace.

History is also presented through the perspective of Palestinian teachers and their students. Inside a Grade 10 West Bank classroom, students are queried on why the Jewish movement chose the Palestinian nation for their homeland? Why not Uganda or Sweden or Belgium, they're asked.

The answer, a young girl responds, is "because by invading Palestine, Israel could influence the rest of the Arab world. By being influential, Israel could be in a strong position and access surrounding Arab countries. Secondly," she says, "there was the historical importance of its churches and other holy places."

As the history class continues, the Palestinian students learn that "Britain gave the Balfour Declaration because the British needed Jewish financial support and because the Jews have influence in the United States and control the media."

"Why has America always supported the Zionist movement?" the teacher asks her students. "Because the United States is mostly under the control of the Zionists that reside in the States," a student responds.

In an area plagued by violence, the film attempts to analyze the effects of the conflict on both sides of the wall. It portrays Israelis, who are traumatized by several years of suicide bombings, and Palestinians, who see no end to occupation and a world where few adults have control over the outcome of their lives.

The complexities of the problem are explored by academics and experts and efforts are made to discuss the myths presented on both sides. Some academics suggest that Israelis are guilty of the sin of omission by not teaching about a significant Palestinian presence in pre-1948 Israel.

Students either accept or reject the messages brought into the classrooms by politicized teachers. For those who accept the messages of hate, the path to radicalism is clear.

Haifa University professor Ilan Pappe suggests that Israelis need to honestly confront their past and teach about the 1948 expulsion of the Arabs. Pappe has since become recognized for his part in organizing the British Association of University Teachers boycott of two Israeli universities, Bar Ilan University and the University of Haifa.

On the Palestinian side, Hadeel Rizq-Qazzaz, a curriculum specialist in Ramallah, notes that it would be naive to ignore the hidden curriculum that is brought into the classrooms by politicized teachers in the West Bank. In the end, students either accept the messages or reject them, she adds, alluding to the fact that for those who accept the messages of hate, the path to radicalism is clear.

In the Israel/Palestine Center for Research and Development in Tantur, focus on teaching the teachers brings an element of hope into an otherwise bleak situation. Given the cultural emphasis that Israelis and Palestinians place on the importance of education, the film illustrates that much more attention needs to be placed on teachers and their hidden agendas.

Lessons in Fear, produced by Tamarack Productions in association with Seneca College, will be aired on ichannel on May 29, at 8 p.m.

Daughters of the Ark

An emerald binds together Debritu's story with that of Aleesha, a young girl from Jerusalem in the time of King Solomon who travels to the court of the Queen of Sheba in Ethiopia. Aleesha and a group of priests from the Temple in Jerusalem accompany Prince Menelik, who according to legend, was the son of King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba.

The idea for the book started to percolate, Morgan said, when, two years ago, she interviewed Shula Mola, then director of the Israeli Association of Ethiopian Jewry. "I found her stories of her work and her journey fascinating." The book is based on Mola's experiences.

Feeling that people don't know as much as they should about the Jews of Ethiopia and their epic journey, she began to research the topic.

"I read about Ethiopia, about Jews there and their journey [to Israel], as well as books about young girls in eastern Africa."

In December 2003, Morgan said, she spent a week interviewing Mola, looking at Ethiopian churches in Israel and talking to their monks and nuns, in order "to get a sense of what happened, through a different perspective."

Last year, she spent three weeks in Ethiopia to do more research and to see what the country was like where Debritu (and Shula Mola) had come from.

She decided to write Mola's story as a work of fiction, because it "allowed me to describe characters and the environment in a freer way."

She wrote for children because "it is important for them to hear stories of other kids – especially, in this case, to see what the Ethiopian children went through to get to Israel."

She also felt it was important for them to see that in many ways, children are children the world over. For instance, When Debritu tells her younger brother that they are to leave their village and everything and everybody they know to go to Israel, he doesn't respond like a saint. He throws a temper tantrum.

The story of the emerald, which Morgan says she made up, begins with Aleesha, who takes an emerald from the breastplate covering the Ark of the Covenant in Jerusalem. The jewel is kept by Aleesha's descendants, and when Debritu leaves for Israel, she is given the emerald to return to Jerusalem.

Morgan's family, husband Ed, an associate professor at the faculty of law at the University of Toronto and national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, and children Jenny, Jacob and Orly, students at Columbia University in New York, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and the Heschel School respectively, were very supportive, and proud of her accomplishment, she said. Although, she confided, "maybe they are a little tired of the whole process."

While she isn't planning a sequel at the moment, she does want to learn and possibly write more about Africa, especially the effect of the AIDS epidemic there.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

KOLEL HOSTS WOMEN'S MISSION 'IN THE LAND OF THE RED TENT'

See Israel through women's eyes via In the Land of the Red Tent, a one-of-a-kind educational trip with Kolel, The Adult Centre For Liberal Jewish Learning, led by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Jan. 24 to Feb. 1, 2006. The focus is on women's experiences in the government, army and religious establishment. Participants tour the Land and learn its rich history and biblical roots. They also see new sights (and old favourites) from a different angle and meet extraordinary women doing extraordinary things.

Spaces are limited. Free information night at Kolel, 151 Eglinton Ave. W., Tuesday, June 7, 7:30 p.m. Kolel is also planning a first-timers' mission and a 2007 Egypt to Israel Passover mission. Details, 416-485-7007, ext. 231.

Couples or Singles Travel to Israel: Peerless Travel of Toronto is offering a high-quality Couples Tour to Israel this summer, geared for married couples while their children are at summer camp.

"If you visited Israel during your teen years, this is the trip for you, to reconnect with the Israeli society and land," the company advises. The itinerary includes the pre-Israel independence Palmach Museum, the new Yad Vashem, the Galilee, Jerusalem, the Dead Sea and Masada. July 6 to 18.

Peerless is also offering the Jewish Singles Festival, geared for singles 25 or older – tours are organized by age groups. The itinerary includes a Bedouin hafla (feast), visits to the Dead Sea and Masada, a party at the Carmel Winery, a Mediterranean tour and more. July 25 to Aug. 1. For details on either tour, phone 905-886-5610, ext. 344, or e-mail peninah@peerlesstravel.com

New Israel Travel Initiative: Melitz, a leading provider of informal educational services in Israel, has launched Lech Lecha Initiatives, which it describes as "a new approach to travel to Israel." Lech Lecha offers a variety of "travel modules" to Israel, allowing individuals and groups to strike the desired balance of outdoor activities from biking to sailing, intermixed with cultural and night-life opportunities, educational touring of important historic or religious sites and travel experiences on other themes.

The company "aims to place decision-making by the North American Diaspora regarding travel to Israel on the same plane as decisions to travel to the Caribbean, Europe and Asia." It also aims to build ties between the Diaspora and Israel that lead to "a lifelong sense of engagement with Israel and... a sense of involvement with Judaism and the Jewish people."

Melitz is offering Lech Lecha Initiatives travel in collaboration with the Prometheus Foundation, a New York not-for-profit corporation seeking new solutions to social issues affecting the Jewish people. Website, www.ThePrometheusFoundation.org

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Put that Kabbalah bracelet aside. There's a new way to wear your Jewish identity on your sleeve.

Sure, Jewish clothing has occasionally been secularized – like a Spiderman kippah. But now secular clothing is being "Jewified."

A new craze in chic clothing has got Jewish written all over it – literally – and many companies are now jumping on the bandwagon.

One T-shirt from Jewcy.com says, "Make bagels, not war." The JewishFashionConspiracy.com sells tees with a tree logo that says, "Yo Semite." And there's the Jerry McGuire lampoon shirt, "You had me at Shalom," from Jewishcouture.com.

There are undergarments and tees, blouses and shorts. And for those who want to start kosher couture at a young age or pass down their fashion sense to the kids, there are Hebrew bibs, too.

Marc Schapiro, 30, owner of KosherKlothing.com, explains that the impetus for his clothing line was the popularity of Jewish words frequently being tossed around by the general population. In one example, he noticed that gentiles were often using the word "kosher" as a phrase-substitute for something good.

The record company marketing director from Brooklyn, N.Y., jumped at the chance to promote kosher kitsch.

"I wanted to take advantage of that opportunity. The people who know the real meaning of kosher will get it, and those who don't will like the shirts anyway."

Shirts featured at Kosher Klothing are a woman's tee that says "Shiksa," another one with "Nice Jewish Girl Gone Bad," and one with a picture of a pig with the word "Kosher" on it.

Since 2001, he has received hundreds of hits per day on his website. Most of the feedback he's received has been positive, he says, even from an Orthodox Jew who works with him.

But some people, he says, are a bit uncomfortable. "A couple of people said they can't believe I put a pig on a shirt and called it kosher."

Kosher couture isn't just a U.S. phenomenon, either. Toronto outlet Sidereal Designs has sold tees for a few years saluting the Israel Defence Forces. Italian clothier Elisha's seductive line features form-fitting finery with pseudo-suggestive messages borrowed from Hillel the Sage: "If not now, when…?" A shirt from Elisha.it costs an average of $175 (US) plus shipping, travels thousands of miles to get to you, and is evidently selling quite well.

Do its buyers know something the rest of us don't, or do they simply have more dollars than sense? Then again, no one ever said the fashion industry has been synonymous with cheap.

In a rare instance of reverse assimilation, British fashion designer Alexander McQueen is bringing menschwear into menswear. McQueen's new winter line features black slacks, white shirts, and black frock coats – the long jackets worn by Chassidim worldwide. He is evidently taking his inspiration from Jean-Paul Gaultier, whose 1993 men's collection included the long black coats, fur hats, and shirttails designed to look like tzitzit. (Jewish-American fashion designer Isaac Mizrahi also at one time tinkered with the idea of creating a trend with the same concepts, but Gaultier beat him to the catwalk.)

Peregal: Post-modern expressionism

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

e-Scapes, a solo exhibition by Paul Peregal at the Mittica Gallery, 903 Queen St. W., reveals the artist as very much his own person.

He says the violent brushstrokes of his works on canvas in this show "evoke a postmodern expressionism and not the chaos of the so-called 'neo-expressionism' of the '80s."

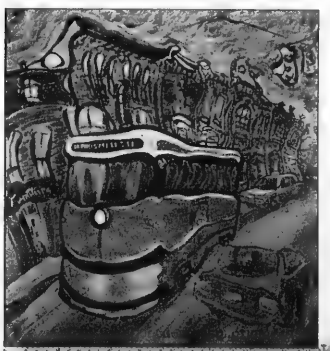
Born in Portland, Maine, raised in Montreal and now living in Toronto, Peregal was fortunate to attend the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts' School of Art and Design, directed by Group of Seven painter Arthur Lismer, who instructed him in colour theory. He also studied painting, sculpture and design at Montreal's École des Beaux Arts.

Paul Peregal



Motion and symbolism define Peregal's works as they seem to burst from the subdued walls of the Mittica Gallery.

A series of three streetcars on the Queen Street route plumb Peregal's personal sense of symbolism. They move, yes, but they are fixed to the track, can't get off the circuit. This represents the artist's sense that he cannot make a radical change in his life.

"Ideally, I'd like to live in London, England," he says, "but I can't. It's too expensive. I can't get to experience that freedom and inspiration. For me, it takes a tremendous effort to change my life."

There is a different symbolism in Peregal's attitude toward houses. He is attracted to what is architecturally fine, but more than that, he sees houses as feminine and sensual. Often there is mystery as well. Who lives here? What happened? Are there spirits lurking?

A stirring example is a medieval home, Pablo Picasso's Château Vauvenargues, in an exquisite setting at the base of Mont Saint Victoire in Provence, France. Of all his chateaux, Vauvenargues was the great one's favourite, although his wife, Jacqueline, noted that visits there were brief because the ancient structure was bitterly cold, almost impossible to heat adequately. Nevertheless, Picasso chose the grounds for his final resting place and he was buried there.

Peregal, moved by the beauty of the site and the link to the man who was also his own person, has created a stunning painting in tribute to one who always dared.

The exhibition continues to June 18. Gallery director is Eva Monique Varga. For information and hours, phone 416-703-3800, fax 416-703-3038 or go to www.mitticagallery.com.

Schulz and the Nazi assault against Jewish creativity

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

No 20th-century Jewish writer has a more compelling biography than Bruno Schulz. He has become a cultural hero in certain circles, based on two slim, eccentric collections of poetic short stories. But the events of his life also draw a kind of obsessive attention.

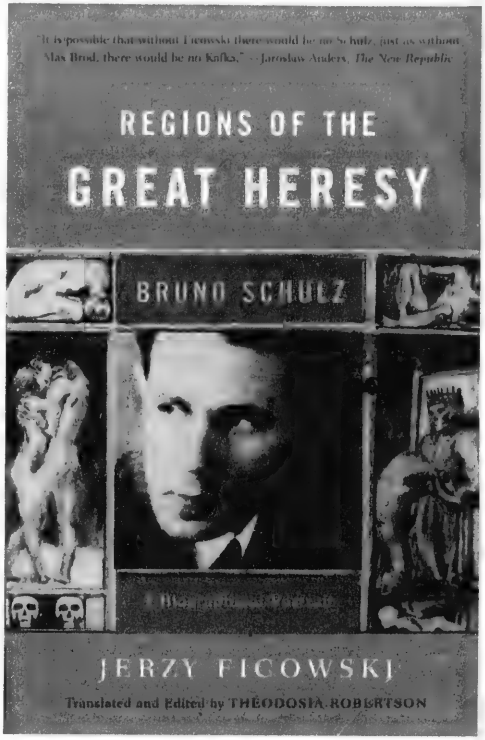
Norman Ravvin

Born in 1892 in the Galician oil town of Drohobycz, a dissatisfied art teacher in the local gymnasium, Schulz was recognized by the cream of Polish inter-war modernist writers upon the appearance in 1933 of his first volume, Cinnamon Shops.

Figures as illustrious as Julian Tuwim, Stanislaw Witkiewicz and Witold Gombrowicz welcomed Schulz into a rarified group of experimenters and critics who were intoxicated by avant-gardist stances and high-flown esthetic philosophies. Schulz was an odd companion in such circles – a shy, congenitally worried and physically frail man, he seems to have been pampered by his more famous colleagues, the way the keepers of a child prodigy protect their charge.

The unsettled years prior to World War II increased Schulz's sense of vulnerability and dread. Under Soviet occupation, life in Drohobycz deteriorated, but nothing could have prepared Galician Jews for the arrival of Nazi occupation in June 1941. The German machinery of destruction was put in place, which included indiscriminate killings, forced labour and a ghetto.

Schulz's artistic abilities protected him and his family in important ways. The brutal commander of the local SS detachment fancied himself an esthete, and awarded Schulz the life-saving status of "Necessary Jew," which resulted in a special armband, special artistic assignments, and a relatively reliable guarantee against arbitrary violence. Schulz was put to work cataloguing the huge stockpile of books stolen by the Nazis from private collections, which were gathered in a building that had been a Jewish orphanage before the war. More importantly, Schulz painted frescoes on the walls of buildings the German occupiers had outfitted as their officers' club, casino and residences.



"It is possible that without Ficowski there would be no Schulz, just as without Max Brod, there would be no Kafka." – Jaroslaw Anders, The New Republic
REGIONS OF THE GREAT HERESY
BRUNO SCHULZ
JERZY FICOWSKI
Translated and Edited by THEODOSIA ROBERTSON

It would take a "wild action," one of the days of indiscriminate street murders in response to perceived Jewish self-defence, to finish off Schulz. A competitor of Schulz's SS protector in the Nazi hierarchy found him in the ghetto and shot him twice in the head. Like much else in Schulz's biography, this event has attained the status of legend and reappears in fictional and memoiristic contexts in many books.

Jerzy Ficowski has pursued Schulz's story, his work and life, since before the war. In the postwar years, he sought out letters, lost manuscripts and interviews with figures who knew Schulz and might help reconstruct a sense of his life and work. The recent English translation and publication, Regions of Great Heresy, is part biography, part literary criticism, part cultural history, and a hundred per cent veneration. Ficowski's efforts in Poland and the Soviet Ukraine, as well as abroad, to pursue Schulz's ghost and further his reputation are remarkable. It is often claimed that without Ficowski, there would be no Schulz in postwar literature.

Among the failed efforts Ficowski describes in Regions of Great Heresy is his inability to recover the manuscript of Schulz's final unpublished novel, The Messiah. Cynthia Ozick, in her 1988 novel The Messiah of Stockholm, does a disappointing job of imagining what this final magnum opus might have been like. Schulz has appeared, as well, as the focus or as a haunting presence, in the work of Philip Roth, Aleksander Hemon, Salman Rushdie and Danilo Kis. His impact on postwar writers is not unlike that of Anne Frank; in different, yet equally heartbreaking ways, each of these unfinished lives symbolizes the loss inflicted on postwar culture by the Nazi assault on European Jewish creativity.

Ficowski's biographical portrait of Schulz offers a good introduction to the author's life and place in Polish letters. His effort to convey the specific magic of Schulz's fiction – in part by focusing on Schulz's notion of childhood as an "age of genius," the source of all creativity – is less successful. For anyone bent on appreciating Schulz's genius, the books Cinnamon Shops (called The Street of Crocodiles in English translation) and Sanatorium Under the Sign of the Hourglass are the sources that merit careful attention.

But Ficowski does convey the manner in which historical events transform a life's work. His own efforts with regard to Schulz stand as a kind of act of resistance to the years of German brutality that devastated Polish Jewish life.

Norman Ravvin's recent novel is Lola by Night. He is the co-editor of The Canadian Jewish Studies Reader and the chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

to you or the charity of your choice, if you will introduce me to the lady I want to meet and possibly marry, because she may not read or answer this ad. She is 75-78, trim, petite and nice looking. She plays bridge and golf, and would fit into my exciting international country club lifestyle. She would supervise two beautiful contemporary homes with live-in help.

I am from out-of-town. I am very nice looking, trim, kind, considerate, very active, golf, bridge, theatre, travel. I have lots of friends, but it's a couples world and I need her to share with me a very interesting, happy and outstanding social life. Please write with your phone number, and a snap would expedite our meeting. I promise we will never, never be lonely again.

THE BEAUTY AROUND US: An exhibition of Toronto-born Israeli artist Ron Gang's paintings at the Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto consists mainly of landscape paintings executed near the artist's Negev Desert home, Kibbutz Urim. Despite the political tension in Israel, Gang prefers to keep the politics out of his work. "Although one cannot bury his head in the sand," says Gang, "there are more levels of reality and life than just politics. If we lose sight of the beauty around us, what is the value of living?" Gang's paintings are about love for the land and creation.

Gang was born in Toronto in 1950, where he received his early art education at King Edward Public School and Central Tech. In 1972 after graduating from University of Toronto in philosophy and Middle Eastern studies, he followed a dream and went to Kibbutz Urim in Israel, subsequently marrying and raising a family. His early years in the kibbutz were spent farming, forming his first bonds with the land. His art studies continued in Israel, graduating from the Tel Aviv (Kalisher) School of Art in 1987. The exhibition will be held at the Holy Blossom Temple Art Gallery, 1950 Bathurst St. The opening reception is on Sunday May 29 at 2:30 p.m. The exhibition runs until the end of June. For times call the Temple's office at 416-789-3291.

Stand-up comedy show supports anti-racism

By PAM CLAVIR
Special to The CJN

Want some hot accounting tips? Just ask comedian Jon Steinberg, who, if he was really writing a book on accounting, would change his name to Moses Steinberg Goldstein in a bid to increase business.

That joke was one of several the 25-year-old comic told at a recent stand-up comedy show promoting anti-racism, held at Ontario Place.

The Ottawa-born comedian had the honour of being the only Jewish comic asked to perform at the first of its kind comedy show, The Most Races on Earth! presented at the Atlantis Theatre earlier this month. Some of the proceeds are going to the Canadian Anti-Racism Education and Research Society (www.antiracist.com).

The purpose of the show, which drew approximately 100 people of various backgrounds, was to promote multiculturalism and understanding within the GTA's various communities and beyond. The show was taped for an upcoming TV program, The Most Races Show on Earth!

Steinberg was one of seven people who represented various races and nationalities including Jamaican, Asian, Italian, Canadian (Newfoundland, in particular) and gay. Yes, in this edgy and entertaining show, gay was considered a race.

Steinberg was the only Toronto-area Jewish comedian chosen to perform, because of his deadpan sense of humour, a type of comedy similar to the one that put Jewish comic Steven Wright on the stand-up comedy map. Wright actually anglicized his name when he changed it from Reich to Wright.

Steinberg performs in Kingston, Windsor and anywhere in between, but his regular gig is at Yuk Yuk's in downtown Toronto where he takes to the stage two or three times a week. With a delivery that resembles Humphrey Bogart's and jokes that would do both Wright and Woody Allen proud, he's a mixture of all three famous personalities. He generates his ideas from television shows and by "accidentally" eavesdropping on other peoples' conversations.

"I listen to people on the streetcars," said Steinberg, who moved to downtown Toronto from Ottawa three years ago.

Saying his father has a terrible sense of humour, Steinberg admits to being pretty funny at family dinners, adding that his family is very encouraging about his choice of profession. Never the class clown, he says he was a fairly quiet student but caught the performance bug when he ran for high school president.

"I was really running as a joke," said Steinberg, who lost the presidential race by a small margin. "But I became hooked on public speaking."

Now, he takes his public speaking and his jokes quite seriously, working solely as a comedian. But with his deliberate and evenly paced style of speaking and unique set of pipes, he hopes to land a few radio commercials and is currently working on putting together a demonstration CD.

Jewish kids gather for karate tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Eitz Chaim Day School gym has probably not seen anything like it before. About 80 robe-wearing youngsters, along with their friends and families, crowded into the facility recently to participate in the first-ever Thornhill Friendship Tournament, an event sponsored by the BudoCan Karate School and Karate College.

The tournament brought together kids aged four to 16 from northern and southern environs in an event designed to strengthen friendships and motivate youngsters to improve their karate skills, said Michael Hirchberg, head sensei (instructor) and owner of Karate College.

Competing under the blue and white Israeli flag, the youngsters were put through their paces employing "kata karate," a discipline involving traditional routines. The "kumite," or fighting version of karate, will likely be added at next year's tournament, he said.

Alon Hircbherg, 6, first-place winner in the advanced 4- to 6-year-old group, and sister Aliyah, 8, first place winner in the advanced 7- to 9-year-old group, demonstrate some poses.

Along with Earl Tucker, instructor and owner of BudoCan, Hirchberg intends to make karate get-togethers a fixture on participants' sports calendars. Karate tournaments are a good way for Jewish kids to socialize and improve their skills, he said.

Hirchberg, a two-time member of the Canadian team at the Maccabiah Games in Israel, said he and Tucker hope to develop future team participants. Since many of the members of the two karate schools are Orthodox, they are not able to compete in Karate Ontario tournaments, which are generally held on Saturdays. When the kids come together, they can improve their skills and eventually earn a trip to the Israeli games, he said.

There are plenty of benefits even for those who don't aspire to elite status, Hirchberg continued. Once they don the robes and take up the sport, they get an immediate infusion of confidence. The sport's discipline and structure are particularly good to help boost kids' self esteem, he said.

Israeli-born fencer wins provincial championship

To be a champion fencer, you need good hand-eye co-ordination, quick feet and a chess player's ability to anticipate an opponent's moves.

Though only 11, Shachar (Shon) Boublil of Montreal is well on the way to mastering those skills. The Israeli-born fencer recently scored a decisive 10-5 win over his next-ranked opponent to capture the gold medal, épée, at the Quebec provincial championship for kids 13 and under.

Boublil's victory was decisive and comes on the heels of last year's Vanquer Medal as the province's top-ranked fencer in his age group.

Boublil, whose family moved to Montreal when he was three, has been training competitively for only two years, but he has been exposed to the sport since he was a baby, explained his father, Ron.

Shon's mother, Helena, serves as an international referee with the Canadian Fencing Federation and his older sister, Sacha, 19, was once a Quebec champion in an under-15 event. Back in Israel, Helena helped establish the Maccabi Tel Aviv fencing club.

"Shon grew up in fencing clubs," said Ron. "Since he was born, he's been in the presence of fencers."

Ron believes that goes a long way – along with his karate training – to explaining his proficiency with the épée.

"Shon is very good at strategy," Ron explained. "He's unpredictable in terms of what he does and because he picks up his opponent's movements, it gives him an edge."

To keep sharp, Shon trains three times a week at Les Mousquetaires, a Montreal fencing club, and he practises karate twice more each week.

His past exposure to the sport keeps him on an even keel, even when he doesn't do well, his father believes.

With his accomplishments to date, there doesn't appear to be a limit to what Shon can accomplish with a sword.

Next year, he will continue his tough training regimen and enter nine or 10 tournaments. As well, he'll probably compete against older kids.

"He wants to take it as far as possible," Ron stated. "He's looking at the Olympics, but it's tough to tell at this age."

Online auction to raise money for Maccabi athletes

With time ticking down to the July 6-24 Maccabiah Games in Israel, Maccabi Canada is launching an online charity auction to raise money for the more than 300 athletes who will wear Canada's colours in Israel.

The online auction features items such as autographed sports equipment, jewelry, cosmetics, a 50-inch plasma TV and a Niagara getaway.

The fundraiser, which is being managed by Auctionwire, an online auction management company, runs from May 22-29 and can be accessed through a link on Maccabi Canada's Website, www.maccabicanada.com.

For more information, call 416-413-4904 or e-mail Maccabi Canada at maccabi@auctionwire.ca.

Apology makes PETA leader a true hero

30 something
By MIRIAM PORTER

I was seven years old when Ingrid Newkirk co-founded what is now the largest and most powerful animal rights organization in the world. People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA), began in 1980 and now has more than 800,000 members. PETA is dedicated to establishing and protecting the rights of all animals. It operates under the belief that animals are not ours to eat, wear, experiment on or use for entertainment. PETA works through public education, cruelty investigations, research, animal rescue, legislation, special events, celebrity involvement and protest campaigns.

Newkirk is currently PETA's president. She has written numerous books, her organization has a vast celebrity membership, and she has spoken around the world to raise awareness, including from the steps of Canada's Parliament Buildings.

When I was a teenager, I saved up $20 from my after-school job to become a PETA member and help make a difference in the world of animal rights. I wanted to be a part of something special and powerful. I admired Newkirk's courage, bravery and her ability to make a difference.

Then in 2003, to the horror of many Jews, including myself, PETA launched a campaign called "Holocaust on Your Plate." The controversial exhibit juxtaposed photos from factory farms and slaughterhouses with photos from Nazi death camps. Controversy also surrounded the PETA exhibit because it was funded in part by a Jewish philanthropist with the support of many prominent Jews.

Over the next two years, I experienced mixed feelings about PETA, and I even let my annual donation lapse. But I researched why it did what it did, I talked about it, I thought about it, and I debated it with friends and animal rights activists.

In March, I wrote a column headlined "My 'kosher' shoes," in which I referenced PETA and used a quote from its website about the cruelty of wearing leather products. In doing this, I finally forgave PETA for its Holocaust campaign. (I have also resumed giving donations to the group.) I knew from following its work for years that its intention is to help animals. I considered the many positive, wonderful and heroic acts that PETA has performed for animals around the world. PETA speaks for those who have no voice. I will never agree with its Holocaust campaign, but I made the decision to focus on the good work it does. Just like with people, sometimes you have to take the bad with the good.

Then on May 5, Newkirk apologized for the pain caused by the 2003 Holocaust on Your Plate Campaign. In a statement e-mailed to the Jewish press and Jewish rights groups to coincide with Holocaust Remembrance Day, she explained that the campaign "was designed to sensitize people to different forms of systematic degradation and exploitation, and the logic and methods employed in factory farms and slaughterhouses are analogous to those used in concentration camps. We realize that many people – Jews and non-Jews alike – cannot see through the pain and horror of what was done to human beings to agree, but to our minds, both systems are hideous and devastating."

Newkirk went on: "Hard as it may be to understand for those who were deeply upset by this campaign, I was bowled over by the negative reception by many in the Jewish community. It was both unintended and unexpected. The PETA staff who proposed that we do it were Jewish, and the patronage for the entire endeavour was Jewish. We were careful to use Jewish authors and scholars and quotes from Holocaust victims and survivors. And since Judaism has some of the strongest teachings regarding compassion for animals among the monotheistic faiths, I truly believed that a large segment of the Jewish community would support it."

Having explained the rationale for the campaign, she then said she is sorry.

"I have decided to apologize for the pain caused by the 'Holocaust on Your Plate' Campaign."

It takes a true hero to stand up in front of the world and apologize for causing pain to others. But in the world of animal rights, Ingrid Newkirk is not just any hero – she is, once again, my hero.

MINI CREAM CHEESE PUFFS

16 oz. cream cheese, at room temperature
3/4 cup sugar
1 tsp. vanilla extract
2 large eggs, at room temperature
18 vanilla wafers
1 20 oz. can pie filling (any fruit)

Preheat oven to 350°F. Line 18 mini muffin cups with paper liners. Blend cheese, sugar, vanilla, and eggs at medium speed until smooth (about 3 mins.), scraping the bowl occasionally. Place a vanilla wafer on the bottom of each of the cups. Fill almost to the top with the cheese mixture.

Bake on centre rack until puffy and set and slightly brown around the edges, 15-20 mins. Cool in pan on a wire rack. Top with dollops of pie filling and refrigerate before serving. Yield: 18.

"Jews in history"

By JOE KING

Isaac Merritt Singer (1811-1875) borrowed $40 and manufactured the first sewing machine for home use in 1851 in Boston.

The first sewing machine was built in France in 1829 – 31 years before Singer produced his machine. Barthelemy Thimmonnier built a sewing machine for his own use, but a Paris uniform manufacturer found out about it and ordered 80 for his plant. However, workers in the plant feared they would lose their jobs to the device and destroyed all but one.

Isaac Merritt Singer

Singer was intrigued by an early Blodgett and Lerow sewing machine brought to him for repairs when he worked in a Boston machine shop in 1850. The inventor immediately realized that he could make the machine more efficient, and he had the marketing skills to make his machine a household word.

Singer was born in Troy, N.Y., to a large Jewish German immigrant family. He left home at 12 and worked at a variety of unskilled jobs. For a time, he worked in the theatre, as an actor, as a stagehand and in the promotion of plays.

He had natural mechanical ability, however, and around 1850, he went to work to improve the sewing machine. He patented his new device in 1851 and began manufacturing it in Boston.

The Singer sewing machine became the top seller around the world and made its inventor a wealthy man. The onetime labourer flaunted his riches, often riding through New York's Central Park in a bright yellow coach.

After his retirement in 1863, Singer moved to England, where he built a mansion in the seaside resort of Torquay. In all, he had 24 children – both legitimate and illegitimate – and he was hospitable to all of them.

At his death, his estate was valued at $13 million, a huge sum in the late 19th century.

Excerpted from The Jewish Contribution to the Modern World.

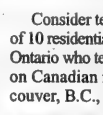
Tikkun olam in Canada

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER



Throughout my education, I was never taught the magnitude of the oppression our native peoples suffered. Furthermore, from what I can determine today, just as most European countries don't include the Holocaust in their schools' curricula, so too has the Canadian education system erased the chapter on persecution of native peoples.

How many of us are truly familiar with the complexion of many native reserves in our country whose level of subsistence dips below poor and often reaches the level of Third World poverty? Who of us is familiar with the enormity of the persecution, execution, torture and mental and sexual abuse perpetrated against our Aboriginal People?

When have our leaders stood before us to rebuke us for our indifference to the plight of our native peoples? Why are we not devastated? Why are we, as Jews, not applying the Jewish imperative of tikkun olam (repairing the world) to our own indigenous people?

Consider testimony from scores of survivors of 10 residential schools in British Columbia and Ontario who testified under oath during tribunals on Canadian residential schools held in Vancouver, B.C., as early as 1998, under the auspices of the International Human Rights Association of American Minorities, a United Nations affiliate.

Their memories include methods of discipline used on children as young as five years old in the residential schools, over a 60-year period, including tightening fish twine and wire around boys' penises; holding the boys over open graves and threatening to bury them alive; forcing them to eat maggot-filled and regurgitated food; telling them their parents were dead and that they were about to be killed; stripping them naked in front of the assembled school and verbally and sexually degrading them; forcing them to stand upright for more than 12 hours at a time until they collapsed; immersing them in ice water; forcing them to sleep outside in winter.

Today, eye-witnesses to murder, torture, sterilization and medical experiments at native residential schools have come forward to divulge a long, concealed history of genocide by church and state in Canada. In his report to Department of Indian Affairs superintendent Duncan Scott in May 1909, Dr. Peter Bryce, Ontario Health Commission, said more than 40 per cent of students were killed. Later reports indicate that by the time the last school closed in 1984, at least 50,000 students had died.

One witness, Harriet Nahanee, a survivor of a residential school in Port Alberni, B.C., told of a reverend who kicked her friend, Maisie Shaw, down a flight of stairs on Christmas Eve, 1946. She said she heard this terrible thud as she hid under the stairs and saw her friend lying still, with her eyes open. Her friend's body disappeared and no one ever saw her again. The Mounties said she died of "pneumonia."

In the new millennium, a UN human rights panel declared that Canada is in violation of international law for its treatment of native peoples and that the condition of Aboriginals is the most pressing human rights issue facing Canadians.

Some steps have been taken to repair the devastation. Former Assembly of First Nations president Phil Fontaine accepted the "apology" of Indian Affairs Minister Jane Stewart for the residential school "abuses." Natives, Métis and Inuit are spared the burden of federal taxes and education is generally free at a post-secondary school for individuals with "native status."

But until our school system publishes history books clearly saying that these painful truths occurred, and we publicly accept that within our borders, astonishing evil was and is perpetrated against native peoples, we will be living a lie about our Canadianism.

Next time you pass a weary native on the street know he or she once walked proudly. This image, these facts, must compel us to ask ourselves: where have we been?

Parizeau wanted Bronfman quiet in 1995 referendum: ex-minister

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Former Quebec premier Jacques Parizeau would only agree to meet Jewish community leaders if Charles Bronfman promised to stay quiet during the 1995 sovereignty referendum campaign, an ex-Parti Québécois cabinet minister says.

In a published 15-page article about the referendum period, Richard Le Hir says Parizeau reneged on the deal, for which Le Hir acted as go-between, and he writes that as a result, the premier blew an opportunity to ease the difficult relationship between the PQ and the Jewish community.

Le Hir says he was approached by Jewish leaders to set up a meeting because he was considered a friend of the community. He writes that when he raised the idea with Parizeau, who had been PQ leader since 1988, Parizeau launched into a "diatribe" about his difficult relations with the Jewish community, and he blamed Bronfman in particular for having "contributed to the climate of fear" in 1980 that led to the defeat of the yes side in that year's referendum on sovereignty.

(On the eve of the PQ's first election victory in November 1976, Bronfman famously aired his fears about the possibility of a separatist government. In subsequent years,

British academics rescind Israeli boycott

U of T school of social work partners with Haifa U

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Only days before Britain's Association of University Teachers (AUT) repealed its boycott of two Israeli academic institutions, Haifa University and Bar-Ilan University, the school of social work at the University of Toronto passed a motion to develop an academic relationship with its faculty counterpart at Haifa U.

The AUT had initiated its controversial boycott to protest policies at the two universities, but the move was widely criticized as anti-Semitic for singling out Israeli universities and for restricting academic freedom.

While the social work faculty in Toronto was considering its options, the council of the McGill Association of University Teachers (MAUT) unanimously passed a resolution condemning the boycott for being "incompatible with academic freedom."

The council recommended the boycott be dropped, said MAUT president Michael Smith.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Rabbi Addresses Rally

TORONTO — Rabbi Mendel Kaplan of Chabad@Flamingo in Thornhill, Ont., joined Muslim and Christian clergy and Tory politicians at a May 23 rally at Queen's Park against the federal government's bill that would legalize same-sex marriage across Canada. "When the prime minister put his hand on the Bible and swore to defend our values, what was he thinking?" the National Post quoted him as telling the rally, attended by some 4,000 people.

Israeli Too Sick to Talk

TORONTO — After pledging to co-operate with investigators, an Israeli who fled Canada for Israel in April after the collapse of a hedge fund he co-founded now says he's too sick to talk. At a hearing May 19 into the collapse of Portus Alternative Asset Management, a judge refused to reveal Boaz Manor's illness, though he said it appears real, Canadian Press reported. KPMG, named Portus' receiver after regulators closed the firm and froze its assets over financial irregularities, said there is no way to force Manor back to Canada and has called for a criminal probe, the Globe and Mail reported.

WORLD

Passport Case Backed

WASHINGTON — Fourteen U.S. congressmen, led by New York Democrat Anthony Weiner, filed an amicus brief in an appeal against a U.S. court ruling allowing the State Department to leave "Israel" off passports of Jerusalem-born citizens because it considers the city's final status as yet to be determined. A court ruled last year against the parents of Menachem Zivotofsky, U.S. citizens who tried to have his birthplace listed as "Jerusalem, Israel" on his passport. Canada has a similar passport policy.

New Survivor Funds

BERLIN — After negotiations with the Claims Conference that ended last month, Germany has agreed to pay an additional $11.4 million for home care for Shoah survivors, on top of a sum agreed to in negotiations last year. As well, survivors of several slave labour camps were added to those who can receive pensions from Germany. Survivors who were incarcerated for at least six months in certain camps in Hungary, Tunisia, Morocco and Algeria are eligible.

Herzog Home Hit

DUBLIN — Swastikas were painted on the childhood home in Ireland of former Israeli president Chaim Herzog. SS insignias also were painted on the Herzog House, where Herzog lived with his father, Rabbi Isaac Halevy Herzog, chief rabbi of Ireland and later Askhenazi chief rabbi of Israel. The attack is the latest in a string of anti-Semitic acts in Ireland in the past month.

Former Envoy Dies

CLEVELAND — Milton Wolf, a Jewish leader and ex-U.S. ambassador, died May 19 of lymphoma in Cleveland at age 80. A real estate developer, he was U.S. ambassador to Austria from 1977 to 1980, chairman of Cleveland's Jewish federation from 1985 to 1988 and president of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee from 1992 to 1995. As ambassador, he hosted the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks in Vienna attended by then-U.S. president Jimmy Carter and Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev.

Zionist History on Sale

NEW YORK — The only known autographed draft of the Balfour Declaration will be auctioned in New York June 16 as part of Zionist leader Leon Simon's archives. The 1917 document called for the establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine. The sale also features a letter from Israel's first president Chaim Weizmann asking colleagues to review the draft. The archive is expected to fetch $500,000 to $800,000.

Israeli Air Force Takes Part in War Games

Israel was scheduled to send 10 F-16 fighter jets and about 150 crew members to participate in the annual Maple Flag exercises over the sprawling Cold Lake weapons range in northern Alberta, Canadian Press reported. About 5,000 air personnel from 11 countries and NATO are taking part in the exercises, which began in mid-May and run to June 24.

A number of other countries, including Qatar and the United Arab Emirates, were invited to send observers.

Palestine House in Toronto objected to Israel's participation. "We don't support this Canadian initiative," spokesperson Issam Alyamani told Canadian Press. "The Israeli Air Force was used to destroy Palestinian houses and it was used against civilians in Gaza and the West Bank. I don't think this will help Canada to have a balanced position vis-a-vis the Arab-Israeli conflict."

But David Rudd, executive director of the Canadian Institute of Strategic Studies, said the invitation to Arab countries may help deflect criticism over inviting Israel.

Abbas secures $12.2 million in aid from Martin

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas managed to collect $12.2 million in aid from Prime Minister Paul Martin during a brief six-hour stop-over in Ottawa last Friday.

Please see related stories

The money, announced at a joint afternoon press conference on Parliament Hill, includes $5 million for judicial reform, $5 million for housing support, $1.2 million to help with Palestinian Legislative Council elections and $500,000 for a scholarship fund for Palestinian refugee women in Lebanon.

In a short speech, Martin expressed his firm support for Abbas' leadership, but he said this new money was "just a down payment" and that Canada and other western nations will need to get more involved as Israel and the Palestinian Authority make moves toward peace.

"Since taking office in January [Abbas] has shown his commitment to peace. He has rejected terrorism and rejected violence, we commend him and he faces many challenges in reforming the Palestinian Authority," Martin said.

Speaking in Arabic, Abbas thanked the Canadian government for the money and stated that under his leadership, the PA is committed to democracy and rejecting terror. He also said Canada has an important role to play on the issue of refugees.

"We are committed to democracy as a way of life to Palestinians. The other ways will not lead to peace," Abbas said.

Canada has also pledged to send a 50-member independent delegation to observe upcoming elections for the Palestinian Legislative Council.

Of particular interest will be Hamas, a group on Canada's list of banned terror groups that is growing in popularity and could secure many votes in elections.

"Hamas are terrorists and you are not going to have a multi-party system that is going to happen unless people are prepared to lay down their arms. Terrorism and democracy are simply incompatible," Martin said of the group.

For his part, Abbas said: "There needs to be only one authority on Palestinian land. There needs to be just one legal system and only one legitimate army, and [we] need to have a multi-party system."

Asked by reporters about Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza, Martin said they are "simply not acceptable... they are illegal."

Abbas didn't meet with any Jewish officials during his visit, but the Israeli Embassy issued a statement saying Israel considers Abbas' visit to Ottawa and his meetings with Martin and Foreign Affairs Minister Pettigrew to be important and useful.

"Israel hopes that the Canadian government will impress upon the leader of the PA that without full cessation of terrorism, the peace process cannot move forward and peace will not be attainable," the release said.

Canada-Israel Committee chair Marc Gold, in a written statement, endorsed the proposal for Canada to extend material support to the Palestinians, but he suggested the funding should be tied to the Palestinians fulfilling their commitments under the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan.

The CIC also raised concerns about anti-Israel and anti-Semitic incitement in Palestinian media, which it said poisons the atmosphere for genuine Israeli-Palestinian reconciliation.

Stockwell Day, the Conservative Party's foreign affairs critic, said he raised those concerns when he met with Abbas, and that he specifically discussed a speech by Sheik Ibrahim Mudeiris broadcast on Palestinian TV that called on Muslims to "finish off" the Jews.

"The president did not deny that that [kind of incitement in PA media] has taken place in the past," Day said, adding that Abbas told him he is working to ensure it doesn't happen in the future.

Abbas' stopover was the first visit to Canada by a head of the PA since former PA president Yasser Arafat's visit in 2000, and it came on the heels of Abbas' visit last week to Washington, where he secured $50 million (US) in aid from U.S. President George W. Bush.

Cast-in-stone assumptions

From the editor's desk

It is unlikely that the publicity handlers of Palestinian Authority leader, Mahmoud Abbas, could have anticipated the soaring extent of the success of their leader's visit to Washington and Ottawa last week. Abbas filled to the top of the rim the two holy chalices of every politician's trip outside his country: substantive reward and positive optics.

In Washington, President George W. Bush promised his visitor an aid package of $50 million to bolster Palestinian infrastructure needs in the Gaza Strip. And as the two men faced the media last Thursday in the sunny Rose Garden of the White House, Bush spoke sternly about Israel's settlement building and the West Bank security fence. The harsh tone of the president's language surprised Israeli officials and Israel's supporters.

The JTA report described Abbas as "beaming" as he stood alongside the president during the press conference knowing that the crowded clutch of nearby television and video cameras were broadcasting the images of the stately visit into Palestinian homes halfway around the world.

And thus did Bush achieve one, if not the key objective, for the visit of the PA leader in the first place: to bolster Abbas' standing among Palestinians in preparation for the legislative assembly elections slated for mid-July.

In the highly visible process of, metaphorically at least, publicly wagging his finger in Israel's face, Bush may have also bolstered his own standing somewhat within the Arab world.

In Ottawa, the PA leader enjoyed much the same result.

This time it was Prime Minister Paul Martin who was beaming, obviously pleased that Abbas had agreed to stop by the Canadian capital for a few hours last Friday on his way home from Washington.

But Abbas was well rewarded for postponing by half a day his flight home. The prime minister promised to give his Palestinian guest $12 million in aid and enthused that the package was "just a down payment."

But there were aspects of the meeting between Martin and Abbas that were upsetting. They were illustrative of the cast-in-stone assumptions that suffuse mainstream understanding of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians and, they also suggest, alas, an utter failure to have any regard for the facts and the history of the conflict.

I will point out merely two.

The first jumped out from the report in the Globe and Mail. "The prime minister also had sharp words about Israeli settlements on occupied Palestinian territory. 'They are illegal.' "

The reporter used the term "occupied" Palestinian territory. The more accurate terminology would have been "disputed" Palestinian territory.

The term "occupied" is loaded with legal implications and was used precisely because it has a meaning de jure above and beyond the de facto description of the presence of Jews in the West Bank.

The land that the reporter described as being occupied Palestinian territory was ruled by Jordan until 1967. Moreover, the border demarcations that differentiate the West Bank from Israel proper (the Green Line as it is sometimes called) are the armistice lines of the ceasefire that marked the end of the fighting in Israel's War of Independence, which was a defensive war fought by Israel after it was attacked by the armies of five Arab states who refused to accept the idea that a sovereign Jewish state should exist in their part of the world.

That Jews did not live there after the armistice was a result of the Jordanian law, still in effect, prohibiting Jews – not Israelis, but Jews – from owning land in Jordan.

No borders between the West Bank and Israel proper were ever formalized. That Palestinian Arabs live in the West Bank should not mean a reflexively automatic exclusion of any Jews being allowed to live there as well.

Surely, if Muslim and Christian Arabs can live in Israel proper, why cannot Jews live in a Palestinian state? The issue of Palestinian statehood in the West Bank is distinct from the issue of Jews being allowed to live there.

Yet, Martin's quick and mindless denunciation of Israeli communities in the West Bank as illegal, lends moral, if not legal, authority to the foul, and I would add obscene, notion that Jews ought not be allowed to live among Palestinians in a Palestinian state.

Then there was the statement in the National Post that "the aid package includes money for… Palestinian refugees in Lebanon…"

That Palestinians in Lebanon are still considered to be refugees after living there for nearly 60 years is a stain upon the Lebanese government that have steadfastly refused to allow Palestinians to become Lebanese citizens. There is no other conflict in modern history whose displaced persons remained refugees for three generations.

Like a field of newly sown seeds irrigated only with tainted water that yields twisted fruit, Palestinian leaders have cultivated nearly three generations of their children with the steady drip of hatred and contempt for Israel and the Jews.

It is a disgrace that Palestinian leaders have instilled in their people a self-identification as refugees and victims only.

It is a double disgrace that the western world, in particular the United Nations, has been complicit in cultivating this harvest of hatred.

Kahane Chai (Kach), an Israeli-based extremist organization that promotes violence against Palestinians, has been added to the list of terrorist groups that are banned in Canada.

Anne McLellan, deputy prime minister and minister of public safety and emergency preparedness, announced last week that the Israeli organization, along with the Iranian Mujahedin-e-Khalq and the Afghani Hezb-e-Islami Gulbuddin, was added to the terrorist entities listed under the Criminal Code.

"Canada is committed to taking all necessary steps as part of the international effort to bring terrorists to justice and to ensure terrorists are denied access to funding," McLellan stated. "The listing of entities is an important part of that ongoing effort."

Kahane Chai (Kach) "is a group of Jewish terrorists whose overall aim is to restore the biblical state of Israel. To this end, the group aims to intimidate and threaten Palestinian families and mount sustained political pressure on the Israeli government," stated a news release issued by the Ministry of Public Safety.

A more menacing description of the organization was published in the United States by the Council on Foreign Relations (COFR). It described Kach and Kahane Chai (they are listed as a single group by the Canadian government) as "marginal Israeli groups that have used terrorism to pursue their goals of expanding Jewish rule across the West Bank and expelling the Palestinians. Both groups grew out of the anti-Arab teachings of Rabbi Meir Kahane, an American-born extremist who founded and led Kach."

Israel outlawed Kach in 1994 after Baruch Goldstein, a U.S.-born Kach supporter, killed 29 worshippers and wounded dozens in a machine gun attack in the Ibrahimi Mosque in Hebron, the COFR recounted.

The United States has also added Kach and Kahane Chai to its roster of foreign terrorist organizations.

Meir Halevi, a spokesperson for the Jewish Defence League (JDL) in Canada, said "there is no Kach or Kahane Chai in Canada to the best of my knowledge."

Kahane Chai did at one time attempt to start up in Toronto, but "it fizzled out."

An organization in Montreal, the New Kach Movement, likewise did not go far, he said.

The JDL, another organization created by the late Rabbi Kahane, is also out of business in Canada, Halevi said, but many JDL supporters continue to be active through the United Israel Action Committee.

Halevi said the JDL in Canada had distanced itself from Kahane Chai and Kach in Israel. "I've always been critical of certain elements in Israel who joined the movement," he said. "It was an unfortunate situation that you have people who are unstable or violent who joined.

"What I don't like seeing happening is Kach or anything associated with Rabbi Kahane made into a mirror image of Hamas. That was not the intention of Rabbi Kahane. [Kach and Kahane Chai] look like right wing, fanatic, religious groups, and it should not have degenerated into that," Halevi said.

Halevi acknowledged that Kahane was expelled from the Knesset, the Israeli parliament, in 1985 for fronting a racist party and opposing democracy. He said the mainstream parties did so to "delegitimize his right to run," but Halevi maintained Rabbi Kahane was not a racist.

Rabbi Kahane warned of the demographic danger to Israel of controlling millions of Palestinians and the current Gaza withdrawal plan recognizes that danger, he said.

"It's clear that disengagement is a euphemism for separation. That's close to what Rabbi Kahane talked about," Halevi added.

Toronto travel agent suing El Al for $50 million

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An organizer of tours and flights to Israel is suing El Al Israel Airlines and several of its top managers for allegedly pressuring travel agencies to not employ him.

Shalom Even, the founder of Shalom-K Tours, a Toronto travel agency that was petitioned into bankruptcy by El Al in 1999, is claiming $50 million in damages from the airline and its senior managers. Even alleges that El Al and its personnel have engaged in conspiracy and "interfered with [his] economic relations."

Legal documents filed in the Ontario Superior Court of Justice allege El Al or its representatives have acted unfairly and unlawfully towards Even "and intended to interfere and have in fact interfered with the plaintiff's [Even's] business," as well as with his contractual relations.

The documents also claim that Stanley Morais, the company's current Canadian general manager, libelled him in an interview with the Catholic Register in 2000.

Three days of court time have been set aside for the case, which was scheduled to begin earlier this week. None of the claims have been proven in court and El Al and its managers have denied all the allegations.

Even's lawyer, Allan Kaufman, said Even's statement of claim relies on a little-known tort that makes it unlawful to induce someone to breach a contract. He said El Al has worked to prevent travel agencies from employing Even in any capacity since Shalom-K went bankrupt, owing the airline $680,000.

"The question for the court is, can a big international airline, once owned by the government of the State of Israel, decide it's going to prevent one individual in his 60s from earning a livelihood in the only field in which he has considerable expertise?" Kaufman said.

The statement of claim, filed five years ago, names El Al as a defendant, along with Yoel Feldschuh, the former president of El Al's worldwide operations; Michael Mayer, the general manager of the airline's North American operations; Moshe Shamai, former general manager of its Canadian operations; Rami Fischer, Shamai's successor in Canada; and Morais.

Morais declined to comment on the case, but the statement of defence in the case denies Even suffered any damages as a result of the airline's conduct.

"These defendants plead that if the plaintiff has suffered damages, it is entirely due to the plaintiff's own activities which led to a bankruptcy and revealed he was not the kind of agent that the defendant, El Al Israel Airlines Limited, should deal with," the airline's legal documents state.

The statement of defence also says that "as a result of his activities, the plaintiff [Even] does not have a good reputation and has not suffered damage in respect of his activities as a vendor of Canadian tours and flights to Israel."

The defence also contends Morais' comments to the Catholic Register were fair comment and not libelous.

Tanenbaum gives hospital $3M for Gamma Knife

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When Joey Tanenbaum learned that Toronto Western Hospital was $3 million shy of having enough money for a Gamma Knife – a non-invasive radiation therapy machine – his philanthropic instincts kicked in.

"The thing that got me was… that for $3 million, it will save 300 lives a year," Tanenbaum said, recalling his initial inspiration to contribute after hearing about the device last fall.

It has been effective at treating such ailments as brain tumours, malformations in the arteries and epilepsy.

"One thing the Talmud says is if you save one life, it's as if you're saving the world. So just imagine how good Toby [his wife] and I feel."

The president and CEO of Jay-M Holdings felt especially proud last week at the hospital when he watched a crane place the 22.5-tonne machine in its new home.

Others on hand for the ceremony showed their gratitude in emotional ways.

"A young lady came over to me at the installation and she said, 'Mr. Tanenbaum, I've got to kiss you.' I said fine, give me a kiss," Tanenbaum said, noting that just days earlier, he and Toby celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary.

"She said that… in 1984, she had an inoperable tumour and the hospital could not [operate]… so they sent her down to the United States to a Gamma Knife centre."

That situation will likely be averted for many patients now that the hospital has the new piece of equipment, which delivers targeted beams of radiation without damaging surrounding tissue.

A unique aspect of the device is that patients receive a single-dose treatment in a procedure that takes only one day.

Funding the Gamma Knife has had a personal dimension for Tanenbaum, who was treated for prostate cancer at University Health Network hospitals and was good friends with Harold Lederman, an active cancer research fundraiser who died of inoperable brain tumours.

Tanenbaum noted that while there are nearly 50 Gamma Knife centres in the United States, the one at Toronto Western is the first and only one in Ontario, though additional centres are planned for Montreal and Winnipeg.

The provincial government is committed to providing about $1.1 million each year to operate the equipment, but Tanenbaum said more should come from government coffers to support such initiatives.

"The fact that the government… doesn't give the money for the capital expenditures of equipment of this type is absolutely unconscionable," he said.

The Joey and Toby Tanenbaum Family Gamma Knife Centre will begin treating patients in September.

Gala to support brain tumour research

Sponsors, patrons and guests will be transported into a glimmering, shimmering world of fun and fantasy in support of a great cause at Sparkle, this year's annual Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Trust Gala.

For the event, designer Nicholas Pinney will transform the Governor's Room at the Liberty Grand Entertainment Complex at Exhibition Place in Toronto into a sparkling Crystal Palace, a mosaic of crystal, mirrors and candlelight.

Beginning at 7:30 p.m. on June 2, patrons will dine on gourmet treats, dance to their favourite '70s tunes by The Travoltas and browse through an all-new outdoor market of spectacular silent auction prizes under the stars.

As always, proceeds from the gala will support brain tumour research and fund programs and services for brain tumour patients and their families at the Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Tumor Centre at Princess Margaret Hospital.

Individual tickets are $225 per person. Event organizers expect more than 1,000 patrons and net proceeds even greater than last year's $500,000.

"Recently, The Pencer Brain Tumor Centre was at the core of a significant breakthrough in the treatment of brain tumours. A new drug protocol has been shown to dramatically improve the prognosis for newly diagnosed patients, offering desperately needed hope to patients and their families, not only at our facility in Toronto, but around the world," said Holly Pencer Bellman, Sparkle co-chair and executive director of The Gerry & Nancy Pencer Brain Trust.

The trust, a not-for-profit organization with a mandate to make a difference in the quality of life of people living with brain tumours, is the primary source of funding for The Pencer Centre at Princess Margaret Hospital.

Inspiring FAST action

From the earliest of mishnaic times, our ancient sages taught us to acknowledge the good that others do for us. Where possible, good deeds should not go unrecognized. This principle is called hakarat hatov, literally meaning, recognition of the good. The "good" in the expression, of course, refers not only to the benefit that is conferred but also to the individual or individuals who actually confer that benefit. In the spirit then, of the simple civil and human decency that underlies the notion of hakarat hatov, it is incumbent upon us to thank Elizabeth and Tony Comper.

The Compers have organized a coalition of influential Canadian business leaders which they call FAST (Fighting Anti-Semitism Together). They are well-positioned to prevail upon their friends and others in the corporate world. Tony Comper is the chief executive officer of the Bank of Montreal.

"I had to do something," Elizabeth Comper told The CJN recently in explaining why she brought the idea for the campaign to her husband. She had resolved to try to do something about the rise of anti-Semitic incidents that rocked Canadian society in 2004.

"This isn't just a Jewish issue. This is an issue of every single person living in Canada. If we can change or move one child, then it's all worth it," Comper said.

"We're sending out the message that the Jewish people are not alone," Tony Comper told The CJN. "We have a prestigious group associated with the project, an impressive roster. And we hope it will broaden over time."

With money collected from corporate donors and in conjunction with Canadian Jewish Congress, the Compers will launch an educational project this fall targeted at public schools that aims to educate both Jewish and non-Jewish students about eradicating anti-Semitism.

We wish the Compers every success in their campaign. And thank them for the goodness of their actions on our behalf, that is, on behalf of the tolerant, inclusive, multi-ethnic Canadian society that we hold so dear.

Marchers for Israel

We wish also to thank the organizers of and the countless participants in the many walkathons for Israel that are being held during this end-of-spring-start-of-summer season. In large and small communities across the country, thousands of Canadians turn out to publicly show their support for the State of Israel and its people.

The heart beats to a patriotic and exciting rhythm all its own at the sight of the blue and white Star of David being carried high and fluttering alongside the red and white Maple Leaf.

On these wonderfully uplifting occasions, the kinship between the two democracies is palpable and we take some comfort in hoping that however trying and difficult the road to true peace might be for Israel, so many Canadians will stand at its side against the inevitably impossible concessions that others will demand of the Jewish state.

Polish collaboration exaggerated

In "From Poland to Israel: revelling in nationhood" (CJN, May 19), David Lazarus writes that "the ghosts of three million Polish Jews haunt Poland," but these ghosts obviously haunt him even more. His way of coming to grips with the past is to resurrect former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir's bigoted allegation that Polish children "imbibed anti-Semitism along with their mother's milk." Lazarus compounds the defamation by linking it with Nazi oppression of Poland, with the effect of devaluing real Polish suffering.

He also exaggerates the number of Poles who collaborated with the Nazis by conflating them with Poles who did nothing: "the great majority, either did nothing, looked away or fully supported the persecution of the Jews." The number of Poles who helped Jews, albeit a minority, was far greater than the number of collaborators. One could write with equal accuracy that the great majority of Poles either helped Jews or did nothing; only a few collaborated. Most Poles were innocent bystanders, not guilty of persecution.

Poles who are longtime residents of Lublin obviously would react to the familiar presence nearby of the Majdanek camp differently than Jewish visitors who are seeing Majdanek for the first time. If the Polish response seems less emotional and too casual, it implies no disrespect to the victims. After all, one-third of the Majdanek prisoners were non-Jewish Poles, a fact apparently unknown to March of the Living participants.

Remembering the Holocaust

On May 8, it was V-E Day and 60 years since the end of World War II. With the passage of so many years, I know that you worry and wonder if future generations will remember you and the Holocaust, remember you even on quiet days, not just special commemoration days like Yom Hashoah or the anniversary of V-E Day.

I suspect you worry, especially today, when it appears that "the way we were" is the way we are and when the postwar "Never Again" has been replaced with "Not Again" and "Enough Already." After what you experienced in Hitler's death camps, or in hiding, you deserve better than another round of racism.

While I am not so foolish to believe that the spin cycle of anti-Semitism will soon stop turning, I am hopeful that the Holocaust will always be remembered. I believe this, even with the revival of anti-Semitism in Europe and as Canada feels the fires of hatred against the Jewish people.

I still have reason to hope that remembrance will be resilient and not fade away. My optimism resides in thousands of American, Canadian and international teenagers and an educational program called the March of the Living, which educates 16-year-olds about the Holocaust.

On Yom Hashoah last month, these teenagers and their chaperones, accompanied by Holocaust survivors, were in Auschwitz retracing the footsteps of the death march, walking the three-kilometre distance from Auschwitz to Birkenau. They walked where 60 years ago more than one million Jews took their final steps to the gas chambers. Surrounded by 18,000 participants from around the world, they marched not in fear, not in despair, but in a strong, silent affirmation of life and remembrance.

The teenagers not only went to death and concentration camps, they also learned about the vibrant life of European Jewry before 1939 by visiting Krakow and Warsaw.

Throughout the trip, Holocaust survivors, including Montreal survivors Rena and Mayer Schondorf, Terry Guttman, and Ella and Ernest Ehrmann, were present to share their testimonies with these teens. Because of the March of the Living, and these Holocaust survivors, I've been able to find a bright spot in a year hemorrhaging heavily with anti-Semitism.

I have another reason to be hopeful that the six million will not become a footnote in history. The Sir Wilfrid Laurier School Board in Rosemere, Que., committed itself to Holocaust education by granting paid educational leave to a colleague and myself so that we could participate in the March as chaperones.

I don't know where God and Man were during the Holocaust, but I do know that you need not worry that your testimonies and memories will be forgotten. The March of the Living and school boards like Sir Wilfrid Laurier help guarantee that the responsibilities of remembrance will be fulfilled by future generations.

The eternal city for the eternal people

The following are excerpts from the address delivered by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Yom Yerushalayim (Jerusalem Day) at Ammunition Hill, May 19, 2004.

Yom Yerushalayim, Jerusalem Day, this year falls on June 6.

On the 26th day of Iyar, 5727, 37 years ago, at the conclusion of a nerve-wracking waiting period, we set out to break the ring of siege and strangulation that tightened around the State of Israel.

Enemy armies were prepared for battle on the various fronts, and the arrogance of their leaders assured them that the fate of the Jewish State was sealed.

Israel did not seek war. Its government sought out every crack to secure, by peaceful means, the freedom to sail through the Straits of Tiran, and to bring about the dispersal of the concentrations of hostile forces on its borders. Only after the failure of all attempts to resolve the crisis by diplomatic means did the government order the Israel Defence Forces to go into battle.

The crown jewel of the Six-Day War was Jerusalem. Jerusalem has been engraved in the soul of the Jewish people ever since David established his capital here more than 3,000 years ago, and since Solomon built the first Temple on Mount Moriah. The oath of the exiles on the rivers of Babylon – "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, may my right hand forget its cunning" – will forever be scorched in the heart of every Jew. From generation to generation, Jerusalem was in our prayers throughout the Diaspora, on workdays and holidays, and in countless songs of yearning, desire and love.

The Jews have never abandoned Jerusalem. Even when forcefully kept away by enemies, they exploited every opportunity to enter its gates and, immediately after the decree was lifted, they again took hold of their city.

In 1948, the bravery of Israel's warriors prevailed in battle within and en route to the besieged and embattled Jerusalem, but it was not within our power to liberate the entire city at that time. For 19 long years, we were cut off from the sacred Jewish places beyond the wall: from the Temple Mount, from the Western Wall, from the Mount of Olives and from the Jewish Quarter.

For 19 long years, from the Abu-Tor outpost or from Mount Zion, we gazed at the Old City. We gazed and we longed. We gazed and we yearned. We gazed and we hoped.

The great honour to redeem Jerusalem eventually fell to Maj.-Gen. Uzi Narkiss and the fighters of the Central Command who were assigned the mission: soldiers from the reserve Paratrooper Brigade under the command of Motta Gur. I knew many of them. Many them were my own cadets and soldiers; the Jerusalem Brigade under the command of Eliezer Amitai; the Harel Brigade under the command of Uri Ben-Ari; and the pilots of the Air Force under the command of Mordechai Hod. Here in this national park surrounding us lay the most difficult battlefield, the valiant battle of the paratroopers. Here, following a night of battle, a new dawn burst forth for Jerusalem. A dawn of redemption.

The fighting was also fierce in other theatres of the war, and the IDF won tremendous victories, but it was the news of Jerusalem's liberation that captured hearts and gave the entire war its profound historic significance in the annals of Jewish history.

Here among you, I have seen quite a few of my comrades who commanded units in the same war on various fronts.

Today, as "we will elevate Jerusalem above our foremost joy," we cherish – with pride, sorrow and gratitude – its fallen: the heroes, those faithful to Jerusalem until their last breaths, and all the fallen of the various battlefields. To the bereaved families, as is the Jewish custom, we say with a loving heart: may God comfort you, "and may you find comfort in Jerusalem."

As a young platoon commander, I fought in the battle to lift the siege on Jerusalem. At the time, I did not believe that 56 years would pass and the battle for Jerusalem would still not be over, but, unfortunately, the battle for Jerusalem continues even today. Those who seek its demise still plot to harm its inhabitants, to sever the unbreakable link between us and Jerusalem.

We stand against them, remaining on guard.

"Upon your walls, O Jerusalem, have I posted guardians; all the day and all the night" the prophet Isaiah said 2,700 years ago. We take this upon ourselves as an eternal oath: we the Jewish people, we the Israel Defence Forces, we the government of Israel – we the guardians of Jerusalem.

We will continue to develop Jerusalem for the benefit of its residents and those around the world who love it. We will build its neighbourhoods, we will praise and glorify its beauty, and protect and defend it against every enemy and foe.

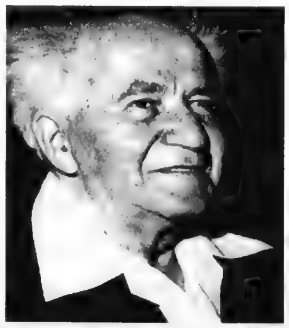
United Jerusalem, the heart of the nation, returned to the embrace of the Jewish people who coronated it in ancient times with a crown of sanctity and royalty, swearing an oath of love and devotion. The one Jerusalem that has been joined together with the State of Israel, and will never be separated again.

The eternal city – for the eternal people – for eternity!

'Jerusalem is the heart of the State of Israel'

In the fall of 1949, the United Nations General Assembly began debating how to implement its decision of Nov. 29, 1947, regarding the partition of Mandatory Palestine, with a focus on the section of the resolution concerning the establishment of Jerusalem as a separate international entity under the auspices of the United Nations.

On the eve of the debate, on Dec. 5, 1949, Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion announced, in a Knesset session, that Jewish Jerusalem is an organic and inseparable part of the State of Israel. The following is a short excerpt from his remarks that day in the Knesset.



"Jewish Jerusalem is an integral part of Jewish history and belief. Jerusalem is the heart of the State of Israel. We are proud of the fact that Jerusalem is also sacred to other religions and will gladly provide access to their holy places and enable them to worship as and where they please, co-operating with the UN to guarantee this…

"We cannot imagine, however, that the UN would attempt to sever Jerusalem from the State of Israel or harm Israel's sovereignty in its eternal capital.

"Twice in the history of our nation were we driven out of Jerusalem, only after being defeated in bitter wars by the larger, stronger forces of Babylon and Rome. Our links with Jerusalem today are no less deep than in the days of Nebuchadnezzar and Titus Flavius, and when Jerusalem was attacked after the 14th of May 1948, our valiant youngsters risked their lives for our sacred capital no less than our forefathers did in the time of the First and Second temples.

"A nation that, for 2,500 years, has faithfully adhered to the vow made by the first exiles by the waters of Babylon not to forget Jerusalem will never agree to be separated from Jerusalem. Jewish Jerusalem will never accept alien rule after thousands of its youngsters liberated their historic homeland for the third time, redeeming Jerusalem from destruction and vandalism."

Opinions

Pitting Jew against Jew

It's been said that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's recent comment to NBC that "the atmosphere [in Israel] looks like the eve of civil war," was just a ploy to frighten an already edgy Israeli public into further supporting his proposed disengagement from Gaza. Nonetheless, the threat of civil unrest is not without foundation and can't be totally discounted as the August withdrawal date approaches.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

We know, for example, that far-right groups in Israel are already distributing a manual titled "A Practical Plan to Stop the Pullout." Add to this public statements by the likes of Arieh Eldad of Israel's National Union Party and Noam Livnat, brother of Education Minister Limor Livnat, and a very disturbing trend becomes even more evident. Eldad has predicted that it's "only a matter of time before someone, a soldier or a settler, begins the shooting, which could easily turn into a bloodbath and escalate into an all-out civil war," while Livnat, a prominent activist in the anti-disengagement camp, has voiced the expectation that some settlers would use force against soldiers and police. "We are in a war," he has told reporters. "There are some limits, and I am not willing to speak about those limits, but this is war."

Fortunately, calls for violence and threats of anarchy are contained within a small segment of Israeli society. The disengagement plan is supported by more than 60 per cent of Israel's Jewish population, while, according to the September 2004 "Peace Index" published by Tel Aviv University's Tami Steinmetz Centre for Peace Research, almost 90 per cent of survey respondents opposed the proposition that "there are situations in which there is no choice and one must use even weapons to prevent the government from carrying out its policy." Yet, it's troubling that the Steinmetz data also showed that while a small majority (55 per cent) of Israelis believe that the danger of civil war erupting over the Gaza evacuation is low, a sizeable minority (40 per cent) thinks there is a high risk of civil war.

As factions within the settler movement dig in their heels and the prospects for civil disobedience intensify, the rift between the settlers and the national consensus will likely widen. How all of this plays out is yet to be determined. But as parochial interests command centre stage, and as the divide between supporters and opponents of disengagement continues to grow, all parties would do well to reflect on the rabbinic precept of sinat chinam (baseless hatred) among Jews, which tells us that throughout history, only bad things have befallen our people when such enmity occurs.

Let us hope, therefore, that this construct will not to be re-tested amid the current tensions.

In the Holy City, time slows to a crawl

One particularly dismaying aspect of getting older, as we all know, is the contraction of time. Years glide by like months, and days dissolve into one another. Would that we could regain that delicious childhood sense of time, when summer vacations seemed to promise and provide an eternity of fun, and a single school year could drag on for what felt like forever through a creeping progression of seasons.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

I was struck once again by the slippery nature of time when, some weeks back, I revisited the Temple Mount in Jerusalem after a lapse of more than four years.

Visits by non-Muslims to the sacred area were discontinued with the outbreak of the violence in September 2000. Fear for the personal safety of Jews and Christians, coupled with concerns about further aggravating an already very tense situation, were behind this policy. Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's strategy of incitement – seeking to secure a Palestinian monopoly over sanctity on the Temple Mount and missing no opportunity to portray the overall situation as a religious war and an assault by the infidel upon the Muslim faith – made any sort of functional compromise impossible.

But the death of the "Chairman" has brought temporary relief. This, together with a moderating Jordanian influence in local Muslim religious affairs, has enabled a degree of inter-communal dialogue and co-operation between Israelis and Palestinians. The resumption of visits to the great and ancient complex atop Mount Moriah, the most sacred of places for the Jewish religion, and much hallowed by Islam and Christianity too, reflects this change in mood.

It was in the context of the 23rd annual Jerusalem Conference of Mayors that I recently led a delegation of 50 municipal heads from around the world through the green Mughrabi gate and onto the hilltop elevation. The strict security checks, a preventive measure taken to thwart provocations by more extreme Jewish groups interested in stirring up trouble at this sensitive juncture, and possibly even in sabotaging the mosques, were eased for our distinguished group. Within moments we were in the compound, roaming at large near the two great Islamic shrines, the Dome of the Rock and the Al-Aqsa Mosque, and availing ourselves of the breathtaking views of the Mount of Olives.

Except for a limited, but very obvious, Israeli police presence near the access gates, the huge esplanade was practically empty. A handful of worshippers drifted in and out of the mosques, taking, for the most part, little notice of our presence, while ushers and guards in the employ of the Muslim holy trust that oversees the area dogged our footsteps at a discreet distance, lazily fingering their "Masbaha" beads and eyeing us with an unlikely combination of bored indifference and keen interest.

In an atmosphere of perfect tranquility untainted by the heated passions and bitter recriminations that have poisoned relations between Jew and Palestinian, we toured leisurely. And throughout, I simply could not shake the all-pervasive sense of the suspension of normal time. It was as though I had stood there by those mosques, if not the day, then certainly the week before. Every little detail was so utterly familiar. Even the Muslim guard monitoring my activities was the very same man I'd known back in the "old days," before the "great flood." Indeed, we exchanged knowing smiles and cordial greetings, of the sort one reserves for regular acquaintances, and there was nothing in either of our manners to indicate that four years had passed between our last "hello" and this latest one.

Like a quickly moving storm, the latest round in the conflict shows signs of receding. Once again, blood was spilled in busloads as thousands were murdered and maimed and countless families were destroyed. Again, funerals became the predominant rite of both peoples. Again, nothing whatsoever was achieved.

And as the swallows swooped acrobatically overhead in their springtime exuberance, the aging Palestinian at my side fingered his worry beads while I spoke of eternities and ancient things in the shadow of the shrines. We were both, it was plainly obvious, a little greyer, a little wearier then we had remembered. And as is often the case around here, time seemed to stand perfectly still, eager to head nowhere very quickly. Culiner@netvision.net.il

A message about Zion that has yet to sink in

I received my first glimpse of Jerusalem late at night, through the windows of a taxi from the airport, going up the steeply twisting road that marks the border between the Mediterranean and the Middle East. We drove straight into the Old City, and, still in a daze, I got out briefly to touch the stones of the Western Wall.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The next morning, I woke up to see the full panorama of more than 3,000 years of Jewish memory, sent my first letter postmarked "Jerusalem, Israel", and began to experience the city's uniqueness. It was a few years after the 1967 war that ended the blockade on access by Jews. The rebuilding of the Jewish Quarter, whose synagogues and other buildings had been destroyed and desecrated under Arab control, was just beginning. The city was still a small town – we were able to walk from one end to the other in a few hours.

Later, when my young family decided to become olim, there was no question that we would make our home in Jerusalem – its magnetic pull is irresistible. And on the "pilgrimage" holidays – particularly Shavuot – we join the throngs pouring out of every corner and alleyway at dawn, on the way to the Kotel. In this and so many other ways, life in Jerusalem is fascinating and unique.

This exceptionality is not lost on the Palestinians, who created their own religious and historical claims, while also turning the Holy City into the prime focus of terrorism. Jerusalemites have known very difficult times, but very few, if any, have pulled up stakes and left as a result. For Israelis, religious and secular, this is simply not an option.

In December 2000, as the Oslo process was on life support and Palestinian violence was escalating, hundreds of thousands of Israelis gathered outside the walls of Jerusalem's Old City. The purpose of this demonstration – perhaps the largest in Israel's history – was to insure that the history of the failed 1949 armistice agreement would not be repeated. As a result of this early example of creative diplomacy, until 1967, Jews could only look across, without being able to cross.

And yet for most Arabs, these extremely deep Jewish links are invisible. Many simply deny any Jewish connection to Jerusalem, as the late Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat told then U.S. president Bill Clinton during the disastrous Camp David summit in July 2000. To admit to Jewish roots that existed 1,500 years before Mohammed and the earliest Islamic claims would be to admit the need to compromise, both theologically and politically. This is apparently unacceptable in the prevailing Arab and Muslim belief systems, which demand exclusivity.

During the tension that accompanied the last stages of the "peace process," the focus on Jerusalem increased, and Palestinians again imposed a blockade on Jews going to the Temple Mount. Under the cover of this blackout, Palestinians also dug deeply into this holy ground – which holds the remnants of the First and Second temples – to expand mosques. In the process, unknowable damage was done to thousands of years of historical remains, where archeologists had never dug.

In this period, as the tension over Jerusalem grew and governments in the United States, Canada and Europe sponsored emergency "regional dialogues," an Egyptian academic asked me why the Jews were so upset about Jerusalem. After all, he noted, we gave up Mount Sinai with less outcry than could be found in protestations over settlements along the Red Sea coast.

Although he is one of the most liberal and well-informed intellectuals in the Arab world, it was clear he had never made the connection between Jerusalem and the "Zion" in Zionism. I took out a tanach (Jewish Bible) and went through its "Zion" references, and then I showed him the references to the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the return to Zion that can be found in almost every Jewish prayer.

Despite decades of declarations about Jerusalem as the "undivided capital of Israel," the message has never sunk in. When peace finally comes to Jerusalem, to Israel and to our neighbours, it will grow out of the understanding of the essential Jewish links to the City of Peace.

The Kirshner File

Germany forges warm, complicated ties with Israel

Horst Kohler, Germany's president, put it best. Addressing the Knesset in February to mark the 40th anniversary of diplomatic relations between Germany and Israel, which actually fell on May 12, he described them as "complicated, warm and close."

Sheldon Kirshner in Berlin

Forged in the shadow of the Holocaust, a crime conceived and administered in Berlin, Germany's relationship with Israel has positively prospered since its first ambassador, Rolf Pauls, presented his credentials to Israel's president, Zalman Shazar, in August 1965. Pauls set foot on Israeli soil 15 years after Israeli and German parliamentarians met in the first formal meeting of its kind, 13 years after Israel and Germany signed a restitution agreement in Luxembourg and five years after David Ben-Gurion, Israel's prime minister, conferred with Konrad Adenauer, Germany's chancellor, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York.

Pauls, the son of a Protestant pastor, a Wehrmacht officer during World War II and a seasoned diplomat, was given a cordial reception by the Israeli government upon arriving in Israel. But some Israelis, notably Menachem Begin, a Polish-born Holocaust survivor and the leader of the militant Herut party, could not reconcile themselves to this startling reality.

Venting their feelings in front of Germany's new seaside embassy at the Sheraton Hotel in Tel Aviv, he and his followers gathered there in an emotional anti-German demonstration. Gauging the public mood, Israel did not send its first envoy to Germany, Asher Ben-Nathan, until about five years later.

Joschka Fischer

Since then, despite the periodic eruption of tensions turning on such issues as the sale of German missile components to Iraq in the 1980s and the upsurge of neo-Nazism in Germany in the early 1990s, Berlin and Jerusalem have established an elaborate and extensive network of ties, formed a welter of exchange programs in fields ranging from culture to science and built thriving trade and commercial relations conservatively valued at $4.5 billion (US) in 2004.

This year, as Germany and Israel observe four decades of friendship in a series of cultural, political and academic events, both sides have reason to be content.

"We consider Germany as our second best friend after the United States," declared Ilan Mor, the chief of mission at Israel's embassy in Berlin. "Germany has devoted itself to the security and welfare of Israel."

Mor, who compares Israel's bonds with Germany to a tightly-knit carpet, explained that German reparation payments to Israel in atonement for its central role in the Holocaust – a sum well into the tens of billions of dollars – have had a profound impact on Israel's economy. And on the human level, he added, youth exchanges and personal connections across the board have bulked up the relationship.

Last week, Israel's foreign minister, Silvan Shalom, visited Germany, stopping at the newly dedicated Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe in the heart of Berlin and meeting with Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer. Shortly after Shalom's departure, Israel's president, Moshe Katsav, flew in for a visit Ruminating on the state of Germany's current relations with Israel, Ruprecht Polenz, the Christian Democratic Union's foreign affairs critic in the Bundestag, said they are in "very good shape." Sipping coffee at the fashionable Cafe Einstein in eastern Berlin, Polenz, a conservative politician, called the relationship "unique" rather than "special." Mor agreed with his choice of terminology.

In general, however, German politicians from Schroeder to Fischer speak of Germany's "special historical" relationship with Israel and refer to it as an inviolable core of its foreign policy. There is a broad consensus here that Israel has a right to exist within secure borders in peace and without fear of terrorism. "That is set in stone and no one should doubt that," said Fischer, a leader of the Green party in Schroeder's Social Democratic coalition government and a frequent visitor to Israel. Alluding to that formulation in his speech to the Knesset this past winter, Kohler said, "Germany will always stand by Israel and its people."

By the same token, Germany, in concert with the European Union, the United States, Russia and China, supports the concept of viable Palestinian nationhood within the framework of a two-state solution.

But, as Polenz pointed out, Germany has real "concerns" about some of Israel's policies. In line with one of the provisions of the "road map" peace plan, both the Christian Democratic Union and the Social Democrats have repeatedly urged Israel to freeze its settlement building program in the territories.

As well, Germany – which has welcomed Israel's decision to withdraw from the Gaza Strip – has sharply questioned the planned route of Israel's separation barrier through the West Bank on the grounds it will interfere with the geographical contiguity of a future Palestinian state. But as Fischer said four months ago, "We are not criticizing the fence. We are criticizing the line of the fence."

Probably Israel's best friend in the European Union, which often takes pot shots at Israeli policies, Germany is just as critical of the Palestinian leadership, saying it should dismantle the terrorist infrastructure as part of its commitment to the road map.

Polenz and Mor also agree that Israel's image in Germany, as elsewhere in Europe, has been badly tarnished by the second Palestinian uprising, which broke out after the failure of the Camp David summit in 2000.

Gerhard Schroeder

Not long after the start of the current intifadah, Rudolf Augstein, the publisher of Der Spiegel, Germany's most influential news magazine, likened Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to Adolf Hitler. Then, Jamal Karsli – a Free Democratic party parliamentarian of Syrian origin – caused an uproar by accusing Israel of using "Nazi methods" in an attempt to quell the intifadah.

Last December, following the release of a European survey in which Israel was castigated as one of the gravest threats to world peace, a public opinion poll commissioned by the University of Bielefeld found that 51 per cent of Germans equated Israel's treatment of Palestinians with Nazi Germany's treatment of Jews. Sixty eight per cent of respondents claimed that Israel was waging "a war of extermination" against the Palestinians.

Polenz, whose town of Munster is twinned with Rishon Lezion, has watched these developments with growing unease. Until quite recently, he said, Israel elicited "great sympathy" among the majority of Germans. They admired the kibbutzim and respected Israel's "military efficiency."

But after the collapse of the Oslo peace process and the outbreak of the current Palestinian uprising, Israel's image declined drastically. "Many [Germans] feel we should be neutral, if not supporting the suffering Palestinians," he said. "And Sharon is not very popular."

Polenz believes that television images of heavily armed Israeli soldiers firing at stone-throwing Palestinian youths have have the effect of demonizing Israel. "For many Germans, this is their picture of the [Arab-Israeli] conflict. And Palestinian suicide attacks are often interpreted as a sign of hopelessness and despair."

In addition, Israel's image was battered by the widespread perception that the 2003 war in Iraq, which was hugely unpopular in Germany, was largely initiated by the United States on behalf of Israel. And now, some Germans have adopted the view that the plague of international terrorism is rooted in the simmering Arab-Israeli conflict, Polenz noted.

Cognizant of Sharon's opposition to the Oslo process, his advocacy of settlements beyond the Green Line and his role in Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, many Germans doubt whether he genuinely supports a two-state solution. They also think he is "playing for time," Polenz said. By contrast, Germans admired one of Sharon's predecessors, Yitzhak Rabin, after whom a street in Berlin is named.

In Polenz's judgment, anti-Semitism plays only a minor role in determining the opinions of Germans critical of Israel.

His gloomy analysis notwithstanding, Polenz is fairly hopeful about the future. In a reference to Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's death, his replacement by Mahmoud Abbas and Israel's anticipated pullout from Gaza, he said, "I'm optimistic we can overcome the turbulence. We have a chance for a fresh start."

Mor, upset by the "twisted" and "unbalanced" coverage of Israel in the German media, asserted that Germans should show "more sympathy and understanding for our situation." Yet he seems confident that Israel's historic relationship with Germany will deepen and endure in the years ahead.

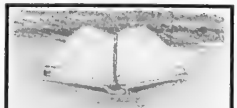
Jewish Life

What's in a name?

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

Bamidbar names our ancestors by tribe and clan, names such as Dan and Asher, Elishama and Ammihud.

Generally, the names in Bamidbar have an actual meaning. In those days, a name conveyed a spiritual reality or hope about a child, or a cultural value that the parent desired would cling to that child. For example, in Elishama, meaning "my God heard," we can detect the hearts of parents who prayed and waited a long time to have a child.



Rabbinic Reflections

The ancient custom of giving a name that represents a hope or value, or that makes a statement, may well be worth pursuing now. Perhaps it's just a coincidence, but I find that women who bear the name "Grace" often bespeak that trait in their behaviour. "Chana" is the Hebrew word for "grace." I wonder whether my own Hebrew name, Levi, led me toward the rabbinate, since Levites formed the first ancient priesthood of Israel, then became helpers to one of the tribe's own ancestral houses (Aaron).

Choosing names that convey a Jewish value or hope and applying those names quite consciously to our children is a way to break out of the habit of only adopting names that are popular and help us to fit in, but at the same time obliterate our uniqueness as a religious people.

In Bamidbar, a typical Israelite could fathom the meaning of the names. The same is not as true about the monikers in our society. Not every Devon is a poet, nor every Desdemona a misery, nor every Jason a healer or hero. We really don't think about the meaning of the names we give. Jews look mainly for a mellifluous sound on the lips and whether a name might not reflect in its sounds a relative whom we'd like to memorialize or honour. Ashkenazim memorialize the dead. Sephardim honour the living.

At a brit habat or a brit milah, I ask parents to explain how they derived the names of their newborn and to describe some of the best qualities of the person after whom the child is named. Often, tears flow, as a loved one is remembered for their unflinching sacrifice or Shabbat presence. Then I add some traditional comments. If a child is named Yonah, a word about the prophet Jonah is in order. Equipped with extra knowledge about the name they've chosen and the family feelings that go with it, we hope the parents will enter their child-rearing years subconsciously more aware of particular Jewish ethical emphases that they should underscore in rearing their child.

Often, when people are asked for their Jewish name, they give a Yiddish one. Yiddish is a Jewish language, but names in Yiddish are often no more Hebrew than names in English. For example, Hirsh or Herschel is Yiddish, and it means deer. But the Hebrew name is Tzvi. Feigie is Feigel, a bird, like the German vogel, but the Hebrew name is Tzipora. Hebrew is a living language with millions of speakers, and in honour of Israel's vital part in our lives, and in memory of the 400 years in which our ancestors in Egyptian bondage never changed their names, we should all become conscious of our Hebrew names, not simply our Yiddish ones.

When reading Bamidbar, take time to reflect on your own Jewish name. What does it mean? If you don't know, it's worth finding out. After whom are you named, and what did that individual contribute to your family's welfare and to your own life? How can you extend that individual's gifts of heart and mind into the future?

There is yet time to honour the names we bear by living in ways that express the best of their legacy to us. How proud their original bearers would be if they knew that we were doing so, and how happy would that make our parents, who gave us these names for precisely this reason.

The value of an interdisciplinary approach

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

In an oddly profound way, schools can often be judged by the attitude of both students and administration toward subjects that are viewed as "secondary" in terms of classroom time and, in a different sense, school values.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

For example, how seriously are Jewish studies taken in schools where the essential ethos is success in the secular world, with the eventual destination of university viewed, often by the parent body, as the keys to the golden kingdom of material and social accomplishment? Conversely, what kind of respect is garnered for general studies in other kinds of Jewish schools, where students have been told from a young age that the primary and perhaps exclusive goal is the study of Torah, with all other disciplines or modes of information perceived as at best a pragmatic if unavoidable evil, and at worst as a domain that is corrupt or gentile?

As rigidly archetypal as these depictions may seem, such attitudes are widespread, and ironically, they mirror one another in terms of a fundamental failure to understand the Torah goal of integrating all of God's creation. With some notable exceptions, the educational message in many institutions, communicated both overtly and subtly, is that students must divide the world into discrete and non-related parts, thus missing a tremendous opportunity to guide the child toward synthesizing the multiple facets of his or her experience.

On a curricular level, what this attests to is the need for greater connections to be drawn between Jewish and general studies in all of our schools – or, in other words, to adopt a philosophy of interdisciplinary studies. By this I mean the process of showing students the various important links and complements between different subjects in their program, as opposed to presenting a dichotomized picture of learning. Presently, they can study Tanach, for instance, and absorb a certain account of Creation, and at the same time receive a totally different view of the topic in science class. Or, they may have a discussion about the Holocaust in Jewish history class without a structured link to the literature of the Shoah in their English program.

This is a mistake of the first order. The goal of interdisciplinary study is not to somehow "correct" the account given in a particular course. Rather, it is to offer an insight into the affinity between religion and science, art and theology, literature and history. Our aim should be to present a sophisticated and compelling view of what is "out there," and to inaugurate students into the age-old "conversation" between different but wonderful parts of reality.

Beyond the intellectual gains, there are also moral issues at stake. Frequently, the behaviour exhibited by students to teachers of undervalued disciplines is unconscionable and displays a defamation of heaven of the very first order. In badly run schools, administrators only pay lip service to the value of these subjects and hence tacitly encourage this kind of boorishness.

If nothing else, the need for administrations to foster a new attitude in these matters would be an opportunity to correct an indefensible wrong and reclaim the right to talk about Jewish ethical pre-eminence.

Two new books

Books
Bernard Baskin

Operation Solomon: The Daring Rescue of the Ethiopian Jews by Stephen Spector, Oxford University Press.

Never Let Me Go by Kazuo Ishiguro, Random House.

It happened toward the end of May 1991: the majestic, massive and swift Israeli airlift of 14,310 Ethiopian Jews to Israel in less than a day and a half. Those rescued called themselves the Beta Israel, the "House of Israel." They believed that the Holy Land was the birthplace of their ancestors and were sure that the time of their redemption had come after a sojourn in Ethiopia that spanned millennia.

In the packed jumbo jet that brought the bewildered and expectant Ethiopians to Israel were more than 1,000 passengers – a record number in the history of civil aviation.

How most of these black Jews made their way from their homeland in the Gondar Highlands to the dangers and uncertainty of Addis Ababa is a story of courage and determination. Stephen Spector, the author of Operation Solomon: The Daring Rescue of the Ethiopian Jews, writes: "To walk over 400 miles from the Jews' villages in the north down through the mountains and on to the capital was extremely difficult, even for the healthiest people. Yet many of the Beta Israel had done it, often arriving sick and malnourished."

Spector attributes much of this wholesale migration to Susan Pollack, an outspoken and determined American activist who was unremitting in her efforts on behalf of the Ethiopians. It was she, writes the author, who more than any other person created the crisis in Addis Ababa that necessitated Operation Solomon.

The entire operation was complicated and always in danger of failure. Rebel forces who opposed the oppressive Mengistu regime had encircled the capital city and an assault was imminent. Moreover, there was the vexatious problem of who was to receive the $35 million that Israel had offered to guarantee the rescue operation.

Much of this thrilling and complex story has been told before, but never so meticulously researched and vividly presented.

Never Let Me Go by Kazuo Ishiguro is entirely different from the author's much-praised earlier books in setting, plot and feeling. The time is in the 1990s and the novel begins by introducing the reader to Hailsham, an elite, rural, English boarding school, far removed from the influence and concerns of the big city.

Its young students are well looked after in a sunlit atmosphere, are encouraged to engage in sports and are instructed in art and literature. They are likeable and innocent.

But there is something missing. There are no parents or relatives and no information is conveyed to the youthful residents about the outside world. There are fleeting but ominous references to their future as "carers" and "donors" at medical recovery centres.

As the suspenseful story slowly unfolds, it becomes clear that the students are a group of human clones, trapped in a society devoid of conscience.

The novel's narrator is 31-year-old Kathy H., a Hailsham alumna, who, as an adult, looks back on her 11-year experience as a "carer" and her involved friendship with Ruth and Tommy in a shifting love triangle.

Ishiguro is a superb literary craftsman, but the pace in Never Let Me Go is slow and eventually tedious. The thoughts and actions of the three main characters grow wearisome. The idea of a totalitarian state engaged in producing clone victims who donate organs is frightening. But the author provides almost no information on the pernicious procedure or anything about the political, social or religious nature of such a society.

Ishiguro, who is born in Nagasaki and raised in England from the age of six, commands our attention. But this subdued dystopic tale of science outpacing ethics fails to make either its subject or its characters believable.

Shavuot and the Top Ten

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It is the original Top Ten list.

On Monday, June 13, the Aseret Hadibrot, the Ten Commandments will be read from the Torah to mark the first day of Shavuot. According to Virtual Jerusalem, "When the Ten Commandments were given at Mount Sinai, the course of human history was changed forever. No document has influenced the course of civilization like the Bible, and it can be argued that of all the contents the Bible, these 10 laws have been the single most influential section." [http://tinyurl.com/atgc5]

You can read the Ten Commandments in Exodus 20:1 or if you prefer, you can have them sung to you at ORT's wonderful website Navigating the Bible. [http://tinyurl.com/b2pek]

In the Torah, the commandments aren't actually numbered. According to Yitzchak Etshalom, that has been a source of controversy in Judaism. "Where does number 1 end, where does number 2 end, etc. ?" he asks. Rabbi Etshalom presents three different numbering schemes as well as an explanation of what significance these commandments play within Judaism. [http://tinyurl.com/ajjbd]

Robin Treistman has written a thought-provoking essay in which she says the commandments are actually statements or categories "into which each of the 613 Torah commandments falls. Name any commandment and I'll bet we can figure out where it belongs: holidays, which sanctify time like Shabbat, belong in the fourth commandment about observing Shabbat. Dealing honestly in business falls under not bearing false testimony." [www.wzo.org.il/encountr/tencom.htm]

Rabbi Anchelle Perl is happy to burst another misconception. Thanks to countless paintings and the unforgettable image of Charlton Heston atop Mount Sinai, we are all familiar with the Ten Commandments etched on those two tablets, square on the bottom, round on the top. Not quite, says Rabbi Perl. He quotes the Talmud to argue that the tablets were actually square on top. He says Judaism has a responsibility to depict accurately one of its most important symbols. [www.rabbiperl.com/holidays.htm]

One popular Shavuot tradition is to stay up and learn throughout the first night of the holiday in anticipation of the giving of the Torah, which is commemorated in the morning. The Union of American Hebrew Congregations has created a detailed booklet for that evening titled "Aseret Hadibrot: Illuminating the Ten Commandments." Topics include a discussion about how Jewish law develops and a look at why there are two different sets of "trope" (cantillation) for the commandments. [http://urj.org/Documents/index.cfm?id=1074]

There are a few Ten Commandments sites focused on kids. The Jewish Theological Seminary site has a large poster celebrating the giving of the Torah that kids can print out and colour. [http://tinyurl.com/96pam] The TorahTots site has a comprehensive look at the preparation the Israelites went through in order receive the Torah, in addition to an explanation of the Ten Commandments geared toward kids [www.torahtots.com/parsha/shmos/yitro2.htm].

The Ten Commandments have not only become central to Judaism; they've woven themselves into our popular culture. Many sites even have lists of lists of "new" commandments. I leave you with a sampling, some sensible, some sublime and some ridiculous:

Ten Commandments of lobbying: "Take your friends where you find them. Today's opponent may be tomorrow's ally." [www.mokids.org/commandments.htm]

• Breastfeeding: "You shall not wean your children for the sake of convenience." [www.alternamoms.com/nursing.html]

• Tractor safety: "Never start a tractor inside a closed shed or garage." [www.kubota.com/f/safety/ten.cfm]

• Square dancing: "Thou shalt take care that the words of thy mouth are not scented with garlic or beer." [http://tinyurl.com/9s9wq]

• Sane living: "Strike a balance between work and play... Nobody ever said on their death bed, 'I wish I had spent more time in the office.'" [http://tinyurl.com/9oz2j]

Have a very happy holiday.

Models strut their stuff for cancer research

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

As red and yellow search lights illuminated the stage, models and dancers walked on their hands, flipped, kicked and spun to the high-energy beats.

This was no run-of-the-mill fashion show. Impacts and Icons, Toronto's first fundraising fashion show for the Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF), the largest source of private funding for cancer research in Israel, blew the audience away.

The show, created, produced and performed entirely by volunteers aged 16 to 26 began with models striking a pose to Madonna's Vogue.

Those who expected to see stick-thin girls tediously saunter down a runway wearing little more than vacant expressions may have been disappointed.

This event – produced by Jamiee Diamond, Jen Weisz and Janna Zittrer who choreographed, modelled and danced, and Josh Naygeboren, who put together the video montages of musical icons like Beastie Boys and Usher – successfully strayed from the traditional fashion show formula.

Joy Wagner, ICRF executive director, was thrilled with the success of the show and said it was all thanks to the determination of every volunteer.

"They really had a vision for everything from the choreography to ways of raising money. They brought the concept to us."

The audience was treated to dance-in-your-seat music and skillfully choreographed moves while the models showed off their threads provided by trendy Toronto boutiques such as Over the Rainbow, Bella, Preloved and Sense of Independence.

The models and dancers enlivened the show with their unabashed attitudes, unafraid to imitate Beyonce's trademark booty shake.

The highlight of the night was the special performance by Nu Limit Entertainment, a group of some of Toronto's most talented dancers who recently won first place in a competition held by York University.

But before the show came to a close, ICRF co-president Sharon London Liss addressed the gathering with words of encouragement for all the volunteers as well as those who donated money to further cancer research.

She said that while great strides have been made in finding a cure, the ICRF will not rest until they will be able to cure all types of a terminal disease that does not discriminate.

"Cancer plays no favourites. It affects mothers, fathers and best friends. Eighty per cent of cancers are curable, but that means that 20 per cent of cancers are not."

But she added, that with the help of the donations, Israeli scientists Avram Hershko and Aaron Ciechanover were able to discover a process that lets cells destroy unwanted proteins, which led to a new type of cancer treatment and resulted in Israel's first Nobel science prize last year.

London Liss hopes that more scientific breakthroughs will lead to a cure "so that one day our children will be able to say, 'What was cancer?'"

Amy Zak, who modelled and helped co-ordinate the show, felt good about being a part of something that is for a good cause.

"My friend Janna, who is one of the four producers, told me about it and I became interested. I wanted to do it because of the cause and I also thought it would be fun," Zak said.

She said while being a part of this event gave her an opportunity to meet new people who shared her interest in raising money for cancer research, the cause also struck a more personal chord.

"I know someone close to me who is a cancer survivor."

Zak is already looking forward to participating in the next fashion show.

"Since the show was such a huge hit, there will probably be one next year."

Wagner agreed that because the first show was such a success, it is poised to become an annual event.

"I can't imagine that it wouldn't be," she said. "This is the most powerful way to engage the future leaders of the Jewish community."

Four Seasons founder offers Sharp words of advice

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

If there is a single event that demonstrates the level of dedication Four Season's staff provide to customers, it's their heroism during last year's tsunami disaster, says Isadore Sharp, founder, chairman and CEO of the legendary hotel and resort chain.

"Three hundred people risked their lives to save other people," Sharp said of employees at the Four Seasons resort in the Maldives, which was ravaged by the destructive waves.

"Not one person was hurt, because of the actions of these people."

Sharp, 73, shared stories from his personal and professional life, including the secrets of his success, at a May 19 Jewish National Fund (JNF) event held at the Four Seasons in Toronto.

The "Invitation to Mingle" fundraiser, presented by the JNF's New Leadership Division, brought about 300 people to the famed hotel.

Sharp, the keynote speaker, recalled that as a youngster, classmates pegged him as one of the least likely to succeed.

"My life revolved around sports and having fun," said Sharp, an Officer of the Order of Canada.

"Partying became my priority."

Nevertheless, he said, those early years were pivotal in preparing him for the business world.

"In sports… you learn the importance of a positive attitude, of how to deal with winning and losing."

Another key factor in his success has been his wife of almost 50 years, Rosalie, whom he extolled for her unwavering support, even when she doubted the practicality of some of his business ideas.

"In 1960, I took Rosalie to the site [of the first hotel]," Sharp said, noting the tract of land in downtown Toronto was somewhat derelict at the time.

"I was explaining to Rosalie about the hotel and resort… and she just smiled and said that was great."

At the time, Rosalie thought the idea would be a total flop, but she recognized her husband's passion and supported him nonetheless.

Sharp parlayed his youthful exuberance into hard work on construction sites, and today, Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts boasts some 65 hotels in more than 30 countries.

Sharp said the chain specializes in operating medium-sized facilities whose luxury is based not on architecture, but service quality.

"Today, our most valuable asset is our people," Sharp said. "Our exceptional customer service is based on the culture of the company."

The event also featured a short film about the JNF's ongoing projects, including a focus on developing the Negev desert, a land mass that occupies nearly two-thirds of Israel, yet is home to less than 10 per cent of its population.

"The greening of the Negev is a great cause," said Mark Lieberman, a member of the JNF New Leadership Committee.

"It's amazing what [JNF] is doing and I wanted to be a part of improving the land of Israel."

She'arim celebrates 25th anniversary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In the past 25 years, She'arim Hebrew Day School has grown from four students to 97.

Apparently the only day school of its kind in North America and possibly the world, She'arim serves students with learning disabilities and/or attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD). The school's graduates generally go on to mainstream high schools. Among its alumni are doctors, engineers and lawyers.

On June 7, the school – which was founded by rabbis Joseph Kelman and Yitzchak Witty along with the late Rabbi Sheldon Steinberg – will honour Neil Nisker, outgoing chair of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, at its 25th anniversary celebration. The dinner, an annual event, will be held at Beth Tzedec Congregation. John Tory, leader of the Conservative party of Ontario, will be the keynote speaker.

Half the funds raised will be donated to an endowment fund for She'arim at the Jewish Foundation. The other 50 per cent, as in past years, will be put toward school operating costs.

Not even half of the school's $1.7 million budget for next year is covered by tuition, which runs $16,250 annually, noted Faigie Davids, She'arim's executive director. The majority of students do not pay the full fee, she added.

On a typical morning last week at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre – the school's home since it moved from Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue four years ago – most students were sitting at desks in their small classes (there is a maximum of nine students per class). In one room students were making challah covers, in another a group of boys lay stomach-down on the floor completing Hebrew word search puzzles for Lag B'Omer. In other rooms, the school choir was practising, a teacher was conducting a lively discussion, a boy did a brief bar mitzvah run-through, and in a few classes students were completing specially designed written exercises aimed at teaching skills that are transferable to other learning situations.

The approach, based on the work of Israeli educator Dr. Reuven Feuerstein, is geared to improving the children's thinking processes and problem-solving abilities. Students learn to break down the information they are given into more manageable components, explained Kathy Manoim, the school's principal.

Children can enter the school at any point from Grade 1 to 7, and in recent years more students have tended to stay until graduation, she said. "They feel this is their school."

Manoim, a social worker who also has a master's degree in education, said that in addition to meeting students' academic needs, the school focuses on building organizational, social and cognitive skills, as well as self-esteem, which may be necessary after their experiences at previous schools that didn't meet their needs.

In addition to educators, She'arim's staff includes an occupational therapist, a music therapist, a speech and language pathologist, a social worker and a child and youth worker.

Experts optimistic about future of Mideast

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Four distinguished experts in politics and journalism agree that there is reason to be optimistic about the future of the Middle East, even while frightening events claw back at the steps that have been made on the road to democracy.

Stewart Bell, senior reporter for the National Post who has travelled to and written about the Middle East, said last week at a town hall meeting titled "Democracy and the Middle East" that there are stirrings of democracy in parts of the Middle East.

But he also acknowledged that the region as a whole is plagued by economic and social instability, internal violence and despotic rulers who will hamper the push for change.

"Fostering democracy in the Middle East may be as difficult as reviving a dying dog, but what kind of people would we be if we didn't try?" asked Bell, who was the keynote speaker at the forum.

He noted that there has been a movement in the area towards some democratic reforms such as the recent push for women's voting rights in Kuwait.

One factor in these reforms could be that immigrants to western countries see how democracy works elsewhere, and are pushing for similar changes in their native lands. Or, Bell suggested, movement towards democracy could mean that U.S. President George W. Bush's doctrine is working by promoting nascent democratic movements.

After former Lebanese prime minister Rafik al-Hariri was assassinated, exiled leaders returned to Lebanon, and the country is preparing for an election later this month. Egypt has also introduced an amendment that will call for competition on election ballots, and King Abdullah of Jordan has replaced his security chief in an attempt to depoliticize the state's police force, said Bell.

On the other hand, he said, Jordanian men are moving through the porous border with Iraq to join the insurgency. Hamas, which is participating in Palestinian elections, is a leading proponent of suicide bombings. Syria has been under military rule for more than 30 years, and its current president won the recent election with 97 per cent of the vote. "When someone gets that much of the vote, it's pretty sure the vote is rigged," quipped Bell.

Israel, he pointed out, is the only country in the Middle East that can be called democratic. But it is Iraq, he said, that will likely be the testing ground for whether Bush's plan to democratize the Middle East will work.

Bell's optimism was echoed by panel member Mark Anshan, a Toronto lawyer and former Canadian diplomat to the United Nations. "I'm somewhat optimistic," he said. "Change is occurring, especially in Iraq, because external forces are creating the opportunity to change."

Yet panel members Salim Mansur, a political science professor at the University of Western Ontario who specializes in the Middle East, and Rev. Majed El-Shafie drew attention to the problems currently facing the region, including state-sanctioned violence and a faulty education system.

"I am personally very optimistic about where the world is headed, but not with the problems in the shorter sense," said Mansur, who cautioned against being overly optimistic.

Rev. El-Shafie suggested that the root of the problem is Islam itself. The way to combat it, he said, is education. "We need to educate the new generation from elementary school until they reach college to respect their own religion and other people's religions," he stressed. Rev. El-Shafie was born a Muslim in Egypt but converted to Christianity. He was imprisoned in Egypt because of his religion, and later escaped to Israel, where he was imprisoned again then released.

The town hall meeting was sponsored by the Media Action Group and moderated by Globe and Mail columnist Margaret Wente.

Dr. Ruth to be honoured

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ruth Westheimer, the world-renowned sex therapist, writer and educator better known as Dr. Ruth, promises that after she arrives to accept an honour by the Association for the Soldiers of Israel (ASI) on behalf of the Canadian Zionist Cultural Association (CZCA), Toronto will not be the same.

"I can't tell you why, but be prepared to do some homework," she said with a giggle, in a telephone interview from her home in New York.

She added that she has a warm place in her heart for Canada because her son and his Canadian-born wife live in Ottawa and teach at Ottawa University and Carleton University respectively, and two of her four grandchildren live there.

Westheimer, almost 77, who has been included on People magazine's most intriguing people of the century list and who still teaches at Yale and Princeton universities, is being honoured at the ASI's annual gala dinner dance, held on erev Yom Yerushalayim, June 5 at Le Parc.

The ASI is the only non-profit organization in Canada that funds programs to ease the burdens faced by soldiers on active duty, by providing such services as mobile club and fitness rooms, synagogues, Internet rooms and care packages for wounded soldiers.

Dr. Ruth to be honoured

CThe CZCA is a registered charity that supports Israeli youth upon completion of their service through scholarships and economic relief, and also provides summer camps for widows and orphans of fallen soldiers and respite centres for bereaved parents and siblings.

Westheimer, the only member of her family to survive the Holocaust, was sent at age 10 from her German home to a Swiss orphanage. Dedicated to building a Jewish homeland, she went to Israel and joined the Haganah, and at age 20 she was seriously injured while on duty as a sniper. "Because I was in Israel at the creation of the state, it is my honour to help out the organization in any way I can.

"Israeli soldiers are Zionists who are committed, determined, courageous and enthusiastic. It is important to get people together to [help them out].

"There is no question that [my experiences] remain with me. I still go to Israel every year, and it is only by chance that I live in the United States. If they hadn't 'forced' me to become Dr. Ruth, I might still be living in Israel," she said, laughing.

Being Jewish has made it easier for her to carry on her career as Dr. Ruth, she says.

"For Jews, sex is never a sin; it is an obligation. A husband has to promise his wife food, shelter and sexual gratification. There are many rules and regulations in Judaism, but there is no celibacy. There is no virtue in being celibate."

Turning 77 the day before the June 5 dinner, Westheimer says she has not yet learned what the word retirement means.

"I still go downhill skiing, but I'm much more careful than I used to be."

Among her weekly rituals, she gets a two-hour massage "in complete silence, and I walk and walk and walk. I'm actually walking now as we speak."

She's not a big eater, she says, and although "I could lose a bit off my stomach, I'm not going to worry about it. I just cannot diet.

"I've learned that at this age I have to do what is good for me. I sleep eight hours every night, and I make sure no journalist ever calls me before 9 a.m.

"I'm also fortunate that I have the best grandchildren in the world. My daughter lives close by with her two children, and the other two grandchildren are an hour away by plane."

Philosophical shift led woman to rabbinical school

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Tamar Elad-Appelbaum believes she is part of a trend. The product of a modern Orthodox family in Jerusalem, she is now in her final year of rabbinical school at Machon Schechter, the Masorti (Conservative) movement's Jerusalem seminary.

In an interview last week at Beth Tzedec Congregation where she will complete a two-week rabbinical student fellowship on June 6, Elad-Appelbaum began to list the other female rabbinical students she knows who grew up modern Orthodox in Israel, giving five examples in quick succession.

"You see, it's a pattern," she said, a smile animating her face despite her jet lag after arriving that morning from Israel with her husband and their six-month-old daughter.

A religious feminist from the time she was a young teenager, Elad-Appelbaum, now 30, said her parents, David and Dina Elad, who taught as shlichim in Montreal in the early 1980s, supported her in her desire to study traditionally male subjects like Talmud.

In the IDF, where she served for three years as a tour guide, she encountered people from other types of Jewish backgrounds for the first time. Growing up in what she described as a vibrant, intellectually stimulating modern Orthodox world, she had never felt the need to venture beyond it.

"Suddenly I met people I never had a chance to know. I saw their love for Israel, and their different perspective."

Following the army, she spent a year at a women's yeshiva, then entered Bar-Ilan University to study law, but switched after a year to the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where she spent three years studying philosophy, modern history and Israeli literature.

As a student, she worked for the Jewish Agency and was sent to Australia, where she attended egalitarian services at a Reform temple for the first time with her host family. "It seemed so bizarre, but so logical at the same time. I came back to Israel with lots of things to think about."

It never occurred to her to study for the rabbinate until after her sister became engaged to the son of a Conservative rabbi. Rabbi David Golinkin, president of the Schechter Institute, heard Elad-Appelbaum give a dvar Torah at one of the celebratory events and asked why she wasn't studying to be a rabbi.

"It was so strange to me," she said. "I had never met a woman rabbi."

Recently married herself, she had already begun to undergo a shift in religious perspective. She and her husband, whose background is also modern Orthodox, joined a Masorti synagogue in Jerusalem.

Tamar Elad-Appelbaum

She found that the mechitzah, the traditional barrier between men and women in an Orthodox synagogue, began to seem less "religious" than it had. Instead, she found meaning in the idea of sitting with one's family to pray.

She read Conservative writings, and began to realize that her ideology was now Conservative. "I had to make a total shift. It was difficult because I was giving up my religious world but also my social world."

But even some of her male, modern Orthodox, friends and colleagues at the Jewish Agency, wondered aloud why they could study to become rabbis and she couldn't, she said. Having studied text together informally, they realized that, intellectually, they were on a par. "I lived in a community that was in favour of studying, but when it came to being a rabbi, that's where the glass ceiling hit."

For Elad-Appelbaum, becoming Masorti meant she "could live a more profound religious life."

Ironically, her taking on the commitment of putting on a tallit and praying every morning – as traditional men do – was seen as "secular" by some people in the modern Orthodox community.

She believes, however, that the Masorti movement has a role to play as a bridge between secular and religious Israelis.

During her stint at Beth Tzedec, Elad-Appelbaum said she planned to spend much of her time teaching, but also learning.

After her ordination, she will become rabbi of Magen Avraham, a 30-year-old Masorti congregation in Omer, near Be'er Sheva. She believes she will be the only Masorti woman rabbi in a pulpit in Israel, although there have been a couple of others in the past.

"I want to learn everything I can. I came with a big notebook, and I want to write down every idea, and see if afterward I can use it in Omer."

Entrepreneur died awaiting liver transplant

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Time has run out for Sheldon Farberman.

The 45-year-old entrepreneur died last week at Sunnybrook and Women's College Hospital of cirrhosis of the liver. He never got the liver transplant he had been desperately waiting for.

Since his diagnosis two years ago, he had battled jaundice, pain, weakness, the loss of his voice and night vision, and numerous hospitalizations. He had also been unable to work.

Earlier this month, his friends and family held a fundraiser to benefit him and, especially, his two children.

He was able to go to the event and give a short but moving speech, said his brother Shane.

Family members said they were stunned that with barely three hours between the funeral being organized and the service, the chapel was standing room only. Sheldon's brother Michael praised him as "a good son, a good brother – he was just a normal, everyday, good person, with a big heart."

Michael Farberman reiterated his brother's plea – which was the subject of two articles in The CJN – for everyone to sign their organ donor card.

Farberman is survived by his wife, Chrysta, children Noah and Juliet, parents Shirley and Dave, and brothers Allan, Michael, Leslie and Shane, as well as a large extended family.

An Ostrovtzer centre planned for Israel

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Ostrovtze, (proper name Ostrowiece), was a small town in Poland, in the district of Kielce. The Jewish community was, generally speaking, a poor one, but it boasted a learned and pious chassidic rebbe, Grand Rabbi Meir Yechiel Halstuk, and a well-respected yeshiva.

In 1939, the town had about 8,000 Jews. By the end of the war, there was no Jewish community in Ostrovtze.

That's not to say that there are no Ostrovtzers. Toronto once had an Ostrovtzer shul, on Cecil Street in the Kensington Market area, and now has a large and active society, which recently celebrated its 80th anniversary. There are also active organizations in New York and Detroit.

Now, Rabbi Yehuda Leib Halstuk, the great-great-nephew of the grand rabbi, is trying to re-establish the glory that was the Ostrovtzer world – in Israel.

First, Rabbi Halstuk established a kolel in Beitar, a city where he also is spiritual leader of a shul, Kehilat Hechal Pinchas. Besides the usual kolel curriculum, which includes advanced studies leading to rabbinic and Jewish law ordination, there is a special department that aims to publish the writings of the Ostrovtzer rebbe. Some have already been published.

Rabbi Halstuk has greater plans. He has been granted land for a major Ostrovtzer centre in two places, Beitar and Jerusalem. While he has no illusions that he will be able to build in both places, he has plans drawn up for the shuls that will also serve as community centres and educational facilities. All his endeavours are under the umbrella of Mosdos Ostrowce, the Ostrovtzer Institutions.

The Jerusalem site is next to the Dan Hotel, near the Old City. It was given to Mosdos Ostrowce by the municipality after a lengthy court battle with a Reform organization, which also wished to build a religious centre there.

A donor from Toronto has already offered to pay part of the costs of the Jerusalem facility.

Rabbi Halstuk, who visited Toronto recently, is more than happy to tell the story of Rabbi Meir Yechiel Halstuk. A very pious man, he had visions of the coming Holocaust. To try to avert what he called the black clouds, he fasted for 40 years, only eating a daily bowl of rice and milk that his shammas brought him in the middle of the night.

Perhaps more to the point, he also encouraged his followers to leave Poland.

One of the more popular stories about Rabbi Halstuk is about a dinner he was at, where many noted rabbis, from long and distinguished rabbinic families, were also present.

Each rabbi stood up and gave a dvar Torah from the teachings of a well-known ancestor. When it was his turn, Rabbi Halstuk simply said, "My father was a baker. He taught me that fresh bread is better than stale." The rebbe died in 1929. His son and successor, Rabbi Yechezkiel Halstuk, together with his five children, were murdered by the Nazis.

For more information, contact Rabbi Halstuk at 972-25725877 or e-mail him at tzrur@Barak-online.net.

בואו לשיר ולהתרגש ביום ירושלים

למעוניינים-נותר מספר מצומצם של כרטיסים.

בטל. 1962 220 416.

קונצרט בני ספרד

הפְּרָדָה

"אָת, ואת תעדות האחריות שהיו בתוכו שָׂמְתָּ במגרה הימנית במטבח".....

Is Syria still pulling Lebanon's strings?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Some journalists continue to report that Syria's departure from Lebanon has fulfilled the requirements of UN Security Council Resolution 1559. But it's important to ask whether Syria's control of Israel's northern neighbour has indeed ended.

The pictures broadcast in late April of the last of approximately 14,000 Syrian soldiers leaving Lebanon seemed to show that Syria's occupation was over. Yet 1559 also demands the removal of Syria's intelligence forces and agents.

Reporting from Damascus, ("Syria puts happy face on humiliating retreat," April 27) the Globe and Mail's Paul Koring wrote that, "It remains unclear whether the pullout [under pressure from the United States, France and parts of the Arab world] signals a real end to Syrian interference in Lebanese domestic affairs or just a pause while Damascus seeks lower-profile means of influence." Koring did not explain what a "real end" to Syria's presence would entail.

The question all along has been whether Syria's intelligence apparatus, which in actuality controlled Lebanon – the soldiers being just the occupation's visible presence – has actually been dismantled. How can this be verified?

Longtime observer Robin Wright, now with the Washington Post, wrote that "Syria's intelligence network has been its chief means of influencing Lebanese political and economic life for almost three decades. About 5,000 Syrian intelligence operatives were deployed in Lebanon."

Twenty to 30 per cent of Syria's economy depended on Lebanon's more prosperous economic base. About one million Syrians worked in Lebanon. It's difficult to understand how Syria could suddenly give up this advantage and survive without a devastating impact. It will be interesting to see whether journalists investigate this economic aspect of the issue.

Wright quoted an unidentified senior U.S. State Department official: "In the many years the Syrians have been there, they've inserted themselves pretty deeply in Lebanon, including intermarriage. They've abandoned their headquarters, but they're still integrated in Lebanese society in a way that can be difficult to detect. There are reports that some Syrian intelligence units have relocated within Beirut, and have even moved to Palestinian refugee camps."

A UN "verification" team was sent to Lebanon in early May to determine whether Syria's intelligence network was still operating. On May 23, BBC News covered the release of the team's report. The UN group concluded that since all previously known sites formerly used by Syrian military intelligence were abandoned, "no Syrian military personnel remain in Lebanon in known locations or in military uniform."

However, the UN team added that it has been "unable to conclude with certainty that all the intelligence apparatus has been withdrawn, [since] intelligence activities are by nature often clandestine."

Will the media persist in exploring Syria's more subtle control of Lebanon, such as its economic leverage and its influence with pro-Syrian elements within the population? Foremost among these is Hezbollah, which dominates the Shiites, who constitute about 40 per cent of Lebanon's population.

Further underscoring Syria's influence, on May 24, Associated Press reported from Beirut that pro-Syrian Lebanese President Emile Lahoud "vowed" to recover the "disputed" border area known as Shebaa Farms ("Har Dov" to Israel). The area is certified by the UN as part of the Golan Heights that formerly belonged to Syria, and cannot in any way be considered Lebanese territory.

Paul Koring also reported that Syria complains of a "double standard." It argues that it has complied with UN Resolution 1559, while Israel remains in control of "Arab lands" in defiance of the UN.

Koring himself wrote that "UN resolutions dated to the 1967 and 1973 Arab-Israeli wars [242/338] call for Israel to withdraw from territory it captured." What Koring failed to mention, however, is that while 1559 in effect calls for Syria's unconditional departure from Lebanon, Resolutions 242/338 condition any Israeli withdrawal from territory captured in the 1967 war upon peace and security guarantees from its Arab neighbours.

Israel has been complying in its 1979 peace treaty with Egypt, which saw it return the Sinai Peninsula. It has also adhered to its 1994 peace deal with Jordan. And it has made efforts, through territorial compromise in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, to achieve peace with the Palestinians during the years of the Oslo process from 1993 to 2000. In short, there is no double standard.

'Boycott went to the heart of academic freedom'

James Barber, dean of the U of T's faculty of social work, said the boycott of Haifa University went "to the heart of academic freedom." At the same time, "some non-Jews in the faculty were concerned by a rise of anti-Semitism in the world, and Canada was not being spared from that.

"This motion allows us to respond to the boycott in a way that is both principled and concrete, one that sets a positive example for our students," Barber said. "It is consistent with the many other anti-oppressive initiatives of the faculty and it offers opportunities for academic enrichment for both students and faculty."

Ernie Lightman, a professor of social work and one of the faculty members who spearheaded the motion at the U of T, said support for the linkage with Haifa U was extensive in the 25-person faculty. Only one member opposed it while two others abstained in a vote taken last week.

Lightman said some of the concrete results of the linkage might include: an exchange program in which students of each school would be given credit for practica (working in the field) at the other school; shared research; an exchange of professors lecturing abroad; and, contingent on funding, joint conferences.

Lightman said discussion about the AUT boycott gave Jewish professors the opportunity to address troubling manifestations of anti-Semitism in their own school. He said he was taken aback earlier this year when a female student in one of his classes made a stereotyped remark about "the Jews..."

"The comment was completely inappropriate and out of line," Lightman said.

While the comment shook him, it was not the first time such a remark was raised in social work classes. A couple of years ago, Jewish faculty members shared stories of similar incidents.

Their concerns over anti-Semitism were given new urgency this year by a series of news reports in various spheres: anti-Semitic threats online by students at a Toronto private boys school; reports of anti-Semitic vandalism; the torching of a Montreal Jewish school; and anti-Semitic statements by aboriginal leaders.

In addition, Lightman said, Jewish faculty members were told by two or three Jewish students that "they felt silenced in the classroom when talking about their personal, Jewish experiences. They felt the atmosphere in class was such that they didn't feel free to raise these issues."

Given that context, several Jewish academics recently met to discuss a response, Lightman said.

"We see the boycott itself as an anti-Semitic act, because the people in England singled out Israel and weren't troubled by other countries," he said. "Singling out Israel could only be interpreted as an anti-Semitic act. There is no other interpretation."

The group drew up a background paper suggesting a linkage with Haifa University's social work faculty. With a former student teaching at the Israeli institution, it was relatively easy to forge links there, while Bar-Ilan has not yet responded to a letter suggesting mutual ties, Lightman said.

Come the fall semester, "it will be very interesting to see what [students'] reaction will be. A number subscribe to the mindless anti-Israel rhetoric that we associate with the left," he said. "A lot is based on ignorance and in some cases it's based on prejudice."

In Britain, meanwhile, the AUT said in rescinding its boycott that it would now base its policy on "providing practical solidarity to Palestinian and Israeli trade unionists and academics," according to CJN news services.

"It is now time to build bridges between those with opposing views here in the UK and to commit to supporting trade unionists in Israel and Palestine working for peace," said the union's general secretary, Sally Hunt.

After the vote to rescind, some union members were set to continue the boycott on their own, said Steven Rose, a delegate from the Open University who spoke in favor of the boycott at the council meeting.

"The genie is out of the bottle and cannot be put back again," he said.

As if to confirm his prediction, the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education was reportedly set to raise the issue at its annual conference last weekend.

And in London, demonstrators at a pro-Palestinian rally demanded a national boycott of Israel. The rally, which drew lawmakers, trade unionists and Muslim leaders, saw legislator George Galloway, a critic of Israel, call for Israeli-made goods to be shunned and for reparations over the 1917 Balfour Declaration, which declared that Jews deserved a homeland in Palestine.

In the Middle East, meanwhile, Al-Quds University president Sari Nusseibeh and Menachem Magidor, president of Hebrew University, issued a joint declaration against the boycott.

"Our position is based upon the belief that it is through co-operation based on mutual respect, rather than boycotts or discrimination, that our common goals can be achieved. Our disaffection with, and condemnation of, acts of academic boycotts is predicated on the principles of academic freedom, human rights and equality between nations and among individuals," their declaration stated.

Afterwards, members of the Union of Palestinian University Professors and Employees called on the board of trustees of Al-Quds University to dismiss Nusseibeh.

Union chairman Muhammad Abu Zeid said the Palestinian union will call for a general strike in all Palestinian universities if Al-Quds University, which is located in east Jerusalem with colleges inside and around the city, does not dismiss Nusseibeh.

Earlier, 21 Nobel Prize winners, including Shimon Peres, Elie Wiesel and Israeli scientists Avram Hershko and Aaron Ciechanover, published a letter calling on the AUT to rescind the boycott.

With reports from JTA and CJN news services.

Guest Voice

Louis Lenkinski, 1921–1995

By FRANK BIALYSTOK

We are approaching the 10th yahrzeit of Louis Lenkinski. Louis was a giant in the Jewish community and in the trade union movement, and a leading advocate for human rights and social justice.

Louis was born in Lodz, Poland, to a working-class, Yiddishist family. In his youth, he was attracted to socialism and became a member of the Bund, which was dedicated to the creation of a classless society where Jews would be accepted as full and equal citizens of Poland. With the establishment of the Lodz ghetto in 1940, Louis became active in the underground as an organizer of the Bund, in opposition to the Judenrat, which collaborated with the Nazis in maintaining firm control in the ghetto.

With his family deported to the extermination camps, Louis managed to survive until the liquidation of the ghetto in 1944. He was deported to a work camp in Czestochowa, where he was liberated by the Soviet forces. He later met and married a fellow Lodzer, Helen Offman, in a German DP camp. In 1950, under the auspices of the Jewish Labour Committee, they came to Canada with their son Berek (Bob), and settled in Toronto, where their second son, Lionel, was born.

Louis became an upholsterer. He quickly became fluent in English, and active in the trade union movement. Having gained the respect of his fellow workers, Louis became affiliated with the Ontario Labour Congress, and eventually became executive assistant to Terry Meagher, the secretary of the OLC. He also became an organizer for the New Democratic Party and a mentor to a generation of its leaders.

In the 1970s, having been active in the Canadian Polish Congress, Louis became the representative of the Solidarity movement in Canada. His belief in building bridges between Poles and Jews of Polish origin in Canada led to the establishment of the Polish Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada. In his last years, Louis became associate chair of the Ontario Human Rights Commission and active in Canadian Jewish Congress, where he rose to the position of chair of the community relations committee for CJC's Ontario region.

Louis' lifelong devotion to justice and human rights, from his youth in Lodz to his last days in Toronto, has been an inspiration to three generations. His tireless insistence on historical accuracy and his refusal to assign collective responsibility, blame and guilt for the heinous crimes of the Holocaust have challenged us to examine the roots and complexities of Polish-Jewish relations.

On the occasion of his 10th yahrzeit, there will be a tribute to Louis on June 2 at 7:30 P.M. at the Barbara Frum Library. The keynote speaker will be Prof. Kalman Weiser, Silber Chair of Holocaust and East European Jewish Studies at York University. His topic is "Fear of Polish: Folkism, Yiddishm, and the Holocaust." Admission is free and all are invited.

Frank Bialystok is a founder of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation and chair of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Million-dollar bequest largest ever to Birthright Israel

MONTREAL – A one million-dollar bequest from the estate of Montreal businessman Andre Aisenstadt enabled some 450 young Jewish adults from across Canada to participate in the current Birthright Israel trip.

The gift sponsored the chartered flight that left Canada May 29 and returns June 8.

This is the largest single gift by a Canadian to Birthright Israel, and the only one that paid for an entire planeload, said Sheila Kornhauser, communications manager for UIA Federations Canada.

Andre Aisenstadt, who died about two years ago, created a philanthropic foundation in his and his late wife Nussia's name about 25 years ago that has founded a variety of institutions in the Jewish and general communities, said Montreal lawyer Michael Vineberg, the foundation's president.

Notably, these include the Jewish General Hospital, which used its bequest to fund its annual Clinical Day, and the Universite de Montreal, which named a building and a mathematics prize in his honour.

Aistenstadt trained in mathematics and science, and was proud of having studied under Albert Einstein in Europe.

However, after coming to Canada, he made his fortune mainly in real estate and the construction boom in the 1950s, Vineberg said.

The Aisenstadts had no children, but Aisenstadt liked children and was always interested in Israel, said Vineberg, who knew Aisenstadt since he was a boy, so he believes this bequest is in keeping with his wishes.

Nancy Rosenfeld, executive-director of the Stephen R. Bronfman Foundation and member of the Canada Israel Experience management committee, said, "This gift also allows us to significantly increase the number of Canadians travelling to Israel this summer. Usually we need to negotiate seats on regularly scheduled airlines and this limits our numbers."

Birthright Israel, which is a free 10-day trip to Israel for those aged 18-26, is funded through a three-way partnership of individual philanthropists, the State of Israel and communities worldwide. Birthright is one of many programs offered by CIE, a not-for-profit organization whose mandate is to strengthen Jewish identity among Jewish youth through time spent in Israel.

Park Area Stormwater Management Plan

The City of Toronto is preparing a stormwater management plan under an Environmental Assessment process to address stormwater pollution of the Don River in the area of Earl Bales Park, and erosion of ravines in the Park. Following earlier consultations with stakeholders and the public, the City of Toronto is recommending the construction of a large stormwater pond in the valley of Earl Bales Park, as well as some ravine restoration measures.

You're invited...

We would like to tell you more about our plans and hear what you think of them, so we are holding a public Open House, followed by a meeting with a presentation by our consultant. In addition, some of our project staff will be available to conduct an explanatory site walk prior to the meeting, if there is interest. You are invited to join us for any, or all, of these events.

Where: Earl Bales Community Centre, 4169 Bathurst St.

When: Tuesday, June 7, 2005

Site Walk: 3:30 to 5:30 p.m.

Open House: 4:00 to 6:00 p.m.

Public Meeting: 6:00 to 8:00 p.m. (Presentation at 6:00 p.m.)

Note: The site walk will begin at the Community Centre and continue for up to two hours. If you plan to join us for this, please wear appropriate footgear and dress for the weather.

Scientific project brings Israel and its foes together

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PETRA, Jordan — Here's some good news from the Middle East: Iran and Israel, bitter enemies, need no "Open Sesame" magic to co-operate on an advanced scientific project.

In Alaan, a town just north of Amman – and at a comfortable remove from the spotlight thrown by political conflicts – representatives of the two countries are involved in developing SESAME, an acronym for Synchrotron-light for Experimental Science and Applications in the Middle East.

It's a rare and possibly unique example of scientific cooperation between Israel, Iran and other countries with which Israel has no ties, such as Pakistan, Bahrain and the United Arab Emirates.

Other members are Jordan, Egypt, the Palestinian Authority and Turkey. Libya is expected to join soon as an observer.

"The political importance of the project cannot be underestimated," Khaled Toukan, Jordan's minister of education and the project's acting director, said. "Scientists in the region work together in a spirit of cooperation for the sake of developing the Middle East."

SESAME, the Middle East's first major international research centre, is a synchrotron accelerator. It uses magnets to create a circular path for electrons travelling at nearly the speed of light, producing a beam of bright ultraviolet and X-ray light, about the diameter of a human hair, that is directed down beam lines to end stations.

"These beam lines are so much stronger than the known X-rays that they open up new options for scientific research," Moshe Deutsch, chair of Israel's national council for synchrotron radiation and one of two Israeli participants in SESAME, told JTA.

SESAME is expected to contribute to a wide range of scientific research, including structural molecular biology, molecular environmental science, X-ray imaging, archeological microanalysis, materials characterization and clinical medical applications.

Synchrotron radiation is widely used in materials science and biomedical applications, including lithography for computer chips, absorption and scattering measurements and high-pressure applications to create artificial diamonds.

An international synchrotron-light source in the Middle East was first proposed in 1997, when peace seemed to be on the way.

The model for SESAME was the CERN Laboratory, near Geneva. It was founded as a multinational consortium after World War II in an effort to bring former enemy countries in Europe closer, and now functions under the auspices of UNESCO.

"It succeeded beyond any expectation, and is now the world's leading high-energy physics laboratory," Deutsch said.

One Israeli newspaper recently came out with a headline that Israeli scientists were helping with Iran's and Egypt's nuclear programs.

"This is absolutely false," Deutsch said. "The synchrotron can have no military use."

But it can have immense political implications. All scientists – including the Iranians – were empowered by their governments; in fact, they are their governments' official representatives on the council, which meets in the region every few months. In other words, it's not merely an occasional collaboration between scientists, but rather official cooperation between the countries concerned, regardless of political animosities.

How is that possible?

"All participants deal only with common scientific ground and nothing else," Deutsch said.

Israel's other representative to the council, Eliezer Rabinovici of Hebrew University, is a theoretical physicist in a field that doesn't overlap with synchrotrons, so his own research won't derive any direct benefit from SESAME. Nevertheless, Rabinovici is an enthusiastic partner.

"I have been with SESAME because I believe we should contribute to our environment to advance peace and create a dialogue designed to break stereotypes," he said.

Rabinovici said that as a physicist he believed in the "parallel universe" theory, which posits a hypothetical universe that exists separately from our own.

"Meeting the other scientists was a way of satisfying curiosity about the 'parallel universe,'" he said. But, he noted, "we leave the political discussions for coffee breaks."

Why did Iran choose to participate in the project along with Israel?

"Iran used to be considered a villain in the world scientific community," Deutsch said. "For Iran, this is a way of getting out of isolation, but the scientific benefits of the project per se are a good enough reason."

Deutsch's comments were affirmed by his Iranian colleague, Reza Mansouri, vice-minister for research at Iran's Ministry of Science, Research and Technology.

Mansouri said "international and regional scientific collaboration is one of the recommendations of science policy in Iran. It is then too natural to collaborate in this project."

Asked if Iran's participation together with Israel had any political significance, Mansouri replied with a brief but decisive "no."

U.S. to indict two senior AIPAC officials on spy charges

By NATHAN GUTTMAN
Ha'aretz daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Justice Department is expected to file indictments against two former senior staffers at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) – Steve Rosen and Keith Weissman – and according to sources familiar with the affair, the charges will be subsumed under the Espionage Act.

A Virginia grand jury is examining evidence in the case, which involves the alleged receipt of classified defence information from Larry Franklin, a Pentagon official, and its transfer to the representative of a foreign country, Naor Gilon, of the Israeli embassy in Washington.

Sources involved in the case confirmed the Espionage Act is on the agenda. But there is also the possibility the Justice Department is raising the intention to use the law in order to reach a plea bargain deal on a lesser offence, albeit one that is still covered by U.S. anti-espionage legislation.

Presumably, if such an indictment is filed against two former top-level AIPAC staff members, Gilon's name will come up, even though he is not a suspect. Israeli officials say he was never questioned in the affair. Gilon heads the political department at the embassy.

The sources say the grand jury will submit indictments in the coming weeks against Rosen, the former head of foreign policy for the lobbying organization, and against Weissman, who was responsible for the Iranian brief at AIPAC. The grand jury is expected to hand down its indictment against Franklin this week. He is suspected of handing over the classified information. That indictment is expected to be similar to the criminal complaint already filed by the FBI.

The classified material is said to involve information about Iranian intentions to harm U.S. soldiers in Iraq, and it was supposedly given to the two former AIPAC staffers during lunch in Virginia on June 26, 2003.

But suspicions against Rosen and Weissman focus on a meeting a year later, on July 12, 2004. Franklin was cooperating by then with the FBI, which had threatened him with an indictment after tracking his earlier meetings with the AIPAC men, discovering the alleged handover of secret information. He agreed to take part in a sting operation in which he would give the two information and the investigators would then follow them.

Franklin called Weissman and asked for a meeting to discuss an important subject. At the meeting, in a mall near the Pentagon, Franklin allegedly told Weissman that Iranian agents were trying to capture Israeli civilians working in the Kurdish area in northern Iraq. Around the same time, there had been conflicting reports about an Israeli presence in Kurdish Iraq. Journalist Seymour Hersh of the New Yorker had written that Israelis were operating there, but Israel and the Americans denied it.

At the meeting, Franklin allegedly told Weissman the information was classified. This is significant in terms of the investigation, since it prevents the AIPAC men from claiming in their defence that they did not know they were dealing with state secrets.

Weissman left the meeting and went straight to Rosen's AIPAC office at Capitol Hill. He said it was a matter of life or death, and that Israeli lives were in immediate danger. The two are alleged to have made three phone calls: to an administration official, to Glenn Kessler of the Washington Post, and to Gilon, at the embassy. Rosen told Gilon about the information and the Israeli official promised he would look into it. All of those calls were wiretapped by the FBI and are part of the case against Rosen and Weissman.

Plato Cacheris, Franklin's lawyer, confirmed to the New York Sun last weekend that his client took part in the sting and said investigators appealed to Franklin's sense of patriotism to win him over.

The fact Rosen and Weissman, as U.S. citizens, are alleged to have given information to an official of a foreign power while knowing it was classified is incriminating under the 1917 Espionage Act, which defines the receipt of classified information for the purpose of helping any foreign entity as a crime.

The estimated 500 cases involving this crime over the last 90 years have always focused on the accused party initiating receipt of the information and on the damage done to the United States as a result. In this case, Franklin initiated the transfer of information, and there is no clear-cut evidence about damage to U.S. interests.

An American present for Abbas

By RON KAMPEAS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Analysis

It was a classic case of "what one hand gives, the other takes away."

U.S. President George W. Bush's announcement last Thursday of $50 million (US) in funding for the Palestinian Authority reverses April's victory for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, when the pro-Israel lobby helped draft provisions in U.S. congressional appropriations that essentially blocked direct aid to the Palestinian Authority.

Bush's news conference with Abbas also included tough language toward Israel, including warnings about Israeli settlement building and the West Bank security barrier.

The handout to the Palestinian Authority – just days after the mere mention of "President Bush" generated automatic cheers at AIPAC's annual policy conference – defies bills from both houses of the U.S. Congress last month.

Those bills all but ordered Bush to funnel $200 million in Palestinian aid money through non-governmental organizations, to Israel, or even on a new tower for Hadassah Hospital – just about anywhere but the Palestinian Authority, which has been beset in the past by rampant corruption and ties to terrorism.

Bush's gesture to the Palestinians, his criticism of Israel and his announcement that he'll soon send U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to the region underscore his commitment to push for a Mideast breakthrough.

Appearing alongside a beaming Abbas, Bush drew a line between the $50 million and his hopes that Israel's planned withdrawal from the Gaza Strip this summer will propel the peace process forward – and grant Bush the foreign policy success he longs for in his second term.

"To help ensure that the Gaza disengagement is a success, the United States will provide to the Palestinian Authority $50 million to be used for new housing and infrastructure projects" in the Gaza Strip, Bush said. "These funds will be used to improve the quality of life of the Palestinians living in Gaza, where poverty and unemployment are very high."

The amount was a surprise. Administration officials had said until about 10 minutes before the news conference that it was not clear if Bush had settled on a sum.

AIPAC declined to comment on the announcement, but was likely to take some consolation in the fact that Bush didn't issue a blank cheque, and said the money would be spent on special projects subject to oversight by U.S. officials. An internal State Department document obtained by JTA suggested the money would go to water treatment plants, municipal services and new homes.

Dovish pro-Israel Jewish groups welcomed the move as a necessary boost for Abbas, a relative moderate they see as the last best chance for peace in the region.

"It's a good sign that the president is willing to work with Abbas and bring the parties together," said Seymour Reich, president of the Israel Policy Forum and one of over 60 Jewish leaders who met with Abbas before his audience with Bush.

Bush circumvented the restrictions on this year's cash by dipping into last year's allocations. Those funds also were subject to restrictions, but AIPAC's friends in Congress suggested they were willing to look the other way to give Abbas a boost.

Israel did not go unscathed in Bush's remarks.

"Israel must remove unauthorized outposts and stop settlement expansion," he said. "The barrier being erected by Israel as a part of its security effort must be a security, rather than political, barrier, and its route should take into account, consistent with security needs, its impact on Palestinians not engaged in terrorist activities."

The U.S.-Israel gap on settlement building was not new, but the warning on the barrier was Bush's first negative reference to it since last summer, when Israel's Supreme Court ordered parts of the fence re-routed to accommodate Palestinian needs.

Palestinian spokespeople have alleged in recent weeks that the new route is more intrusive than the last, even though it's closer to the pre-1967 boundary between Israel and the West Bank. Bush's dig suggests he is listening to such complaints.

Significantly, Bush also said he would send Rice to the region just before the pullout. That means the United States is increasing its stake in the peace process.

Success in the Middle East would touch on almost all of Bush's global strategies. Progress between Israel and the Palestinians would help bring Europe and Arab nations into Iraq, where the U.S.-led occupation remains under deadly fire. It could nudge Russia into joining efforts to isolate Iran, and it could also help convince Muslim nations in the Far East, including Malaysia and Indonesia, that Bush wants to counter China's increasing influence.

Bush repeated previous demands for Abbas to crack down on terrorism, but he commended him for taking steps toward ending violence.

"He's committed," Bush said. "That's what he said he is going to do, and he's now fulfilling it."

"Fulfilling it" goes further than Israeli officials, who say they believe Abbas is sincere but misguided when he says he can neutralize Hamas and other terrorist groups by co-opting them into the political process while leaving their military infrastructure intact.

The problem is the gap between Abbas' intentions and what's happening on the ground, an Israeli official, speaking anonymously, told JTA. "Hamas is building itself as an alternative authority. They're now involved in setting up a popular army, and time is running out on the ability to disarm Hamas."

The $50 million and the tough talk on settlements and the barrier fell short of the Palestinians' wish list. They wanted Bush to accelerate the process and urge Israel to allow the Palestinians to re-arm, and they wanted those commitments in a letter.

Still, the gestures might be enough for Abbas before Palestinian legislative elections, where he needs a boost against Hamas.

Palestinians said that they understood they had much to do.

"There were rockets fired; there were Tel Aviv suicide bombings at some point," PA Foreign Minister Nasser al-Kidwa said in a May 25 news conference. "There were other things as well. So we need to take our commitments as seriously as we take the necessity of the other side to implement theirs."

Abbas also understood that while Bush may have spoken bluntly, his words were directed at a good friend which is why Abbas reached out to Jewish leaders.

In a long and blunt, but friendly, exchange, Abbas said Israel was delaying co-ordination on the Gaza withdrawal. He also said he wants Israel to open back-channel talks on tough permanent-status issues, including Jerusalem and Palestinian refugees, so they don't stymie negotiators at a later date.

Israeli officials say Palestinians are mishandling the co-ordination, apparently because of internal disputes over who is in control. Palestinians cancelled two recent meetings at the last minute, one on water and the other on sewage. Back-channel talks, they suggest, are out of the question until the Palestinians get the details right.

PA leader preparing for war, researcher warns

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For Israeli researcher and journalist David Bedein, it's deja vu all over again.

Years ago, at the height of international enthusiasm over the Oslo peace process, the western media ignored then-Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's calls for jihad, his incendiary rhetoric and the denigrating treatment of Jews presented in Palestinian school text books.

Now, Bedein believes, it's happening again.

Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas, also known by his nom de guerre Abu Mazen, is hoodwinking the western press, Bedein said.

With his gentlemanly business suit, his soothing language and his electoral victory, he's able to hide the fact "he is preparing big time war," he added.

Bedein was in Washington recently, ahead of Abbas' visit, to present "open source information" about events in the Palestinian territories to the legislative assistants of several U.S. congressmen and senators, as well as to four congressmen. In addition, written material outlining his findings were presented to 27 congressional offices.

The material included opinion articles from PA-controlled media advocating violence against Israel; TV reports that praised as martyrs the Palestinians who bombed the Stage nightclub in Israel last February; cartoons in PA media depicting Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon eating Palestinian children; and "the mantra of Israel and Zionism as the enemy."

Bedein, bureau chief of the Israel Resource News Agency (IRNA), said Abbas' Washington visit was to include a plea for funds for security, health and welfare, as well as $7 million (US) to help support Palestinian schools.

He said he was not particularly surprised to learn in Washington that the American aid agency that allocates the education funds, USAID, does not examine the curriculum being taught in the schools.

IRNA researchers, who study Palestinian media in the Arabic language, find that Palestinians make no attempt to hide what they're saying.

A recent radio broadcast that analyzed the efficacy of violence concluded that "'We killed 1,000 and got Gaza, so if we kill 5,000, we'll get al-Quds (Jerusalem),'" Bedein reported.

A sermon on PA television by Sheikh Ibrahim Muderis, which described Israel as "a cancer spreading through the body of the Islamic nation," was not unusual for Palestinian TV, Bedein stated.

Speaking before Palestinian Authority Information Minister Nabil Shaath called for the suspension of Muderis, a PA-employed Muslim preacher, Bedein said other broadcasts have alleged that Israel murders Palestinian women by using radiation equipment at checkpoints.

The western media, as well as Jewish organizations, don't acknowledge what the Palestinians are saying to each other because "it doesn't fit the script."

The same mistaken belief was held throughout the 1990s, Bedein said "People didn't learn the mistakes of Arafat, and it's tragic."

"No one wants to upset the apple cart… It's the whole disease of political correctness that has conquered the media. It's beyond belief. It's the same media cover-up of Arafat's calls for war 10 years ago," he said.

Happy birthday Jordan

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom sent a letter last week to his Jordanian counterpart Farouk Kasrawi on the occasion of Jordan's 59th Independence Day. Shalom wrote that Jordan has a central role in strengthening moderates in the Mideast and that Israel ascribes strategic importance to its relations with Jordan and is determined to advance bilateral relations between the countries.

Lebanon vows to take land

Lebanon's president pledged to win a portion of the Golan Heights from Israel. Emile Lahoud said he is "determined to liberate the remaining occupied Shebaa Farms from Israeli occupation," Associated Press reported. Israel captured Shebaa Farms, a portion of the Golan Heights, from Syria in the 1967 Six Day War. After Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon in May 2000, the United Nations said Lebanon's claim to Shebaa Farms was baseless. Lahoud said that "Lebanon would continue its legitimate struggle with Israel until a global, comprehensive and just peace is reached in the Middle East region."

Hezbollah to keep fighting

Hezbollah vowed never to disarm. "Any hand that reaches out to our weapons is an Israeli hand that will be cut off," Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, leader of the Lebanese terrorist group, told a rally to mark the fifth anniversary of Israel's pullout from southern Lebanon. UN Security Council resolutions obligate Hezbollah to disarm, but the groups says it will continue fighting Israel. Nasrallah boasted Hezbollah has thousands of rockets trained on "northern occupied Palestine," meaning northern Israel.

Hamas to hold fire?

Hamas leaders said the group will maintain a "state of calm" in Gaza during Israel's withdrawal this summer. Hamas officials told the Jerusalem Post they were pleased by Israel's decision to leave, but that resistance efforts, which include suicide bombings, would continue in the West Bank after disengagement. Israeli officials said they were skeptical of Hamas' assertions, saying the group probably would not be able to resist the temptation of attacking departing Israelis.

Noted columnist dies

Newspaper columnist Carl Alpert died on May 12 at age 92. Alpert, who was born in Cambridge, Mass., moved to Israel with his wife, Nechama, in 1949 and began working in the new public relations and fundraising department at Haifa's Technion-Israel Institute of Technology, the Jerusalem Post reported. Alpert's column, which he started writing in 1937, was published over the years in close to 70 Jewish newspapers and magazines worldwide. He continued writing the column until this past March.

Ron Arad is dead, former German mediator claims

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BERLIN — Hopes that Israeli Air Force navigator Ron Arad is still alive, almost 19 years after his disappearance in Lebanon, can be discounted, says the German intermediary who tried to free him from captivity.

"For me, Arad is dead," declared Bernd Schmidbauer, who played a key role in efforts to find and release him.

But he did not dismiss the possibility, remote as it may be, that Arad could still be alive. "It's possible."

In an interview in his office near the Brandenburg Gate, Schmidbauer, the former co-ordinator of Germany's Federal Intelligence Services, known as the BND, said he shuttled between Berlin, Beirut, Damascus, Tehran and Jerusalem in a concerted bid to learn of Arad's whereabouts.

And he almost succeeded. "We were very close to freeing Ron Arad," disclosed Schmidbauer, who co-ordinated the activities of the BND from 1991 to 1998 and who has been a member of parliament since 1983.

"For a long time, I thought he was alive," he added. "But at a certain point, I concluded this was not the case."

Arad was reportedly last seen alive in southern Lebanon on Oct. 6, 1986, after bailing out of an F-4 Phantom jet either shot down or incapacitated by engine troubles.

The plane, the first Israeli aircraft lost in Lebanon since Israel's 1982 invasion, was on a bombing run of Hezbollah targets when it was hit or malfunctioned.

The pilot was rescued by an Israeli helicopter, but Arad fell into the hands of Hezbollah or Amal, the Lebanese militias that resisted Israel's occupation of southern Lebanon.

Arad, after his capture, was likely turned over to Iran's Revolutionary Guards in the Bekaa Valley.

He was then taken to Iran via Syria, German filmmaker Hubert Seipel claims in An Eye for an Eye, a 2004 documentary based on BND documents. There his trail faded.

Seipel believes the BND's attempt to locate Arad, dubbed Operation Orchid, was launched in 1994 and was one of Germany's longest and costliest foreign missions.

It meshed with Germany's other role – conducting prisoner exchanges with Hezbollah on Israel's behalf.

Schmidbauer, a tall, elegant man of 66 with a mane of silver hair who represents the conservative Christian Democratic Union in the Bundestag, said he spent about 100 hours in a three-year period in the mid-1990s on both missions. Among his interlocutors in Jerusalem were the Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and the director of the Mossad.

While Schmidbauer failed to free Arad, he presided over the biggest prisoner exchange between Israel and Hezbollah in many years.

Under an agreement carried out on July 22, 1996, Israel and its surrogate, the South Lebanon Army, returned 40 Arab captives and the corpses of more than 100 Arab fighters in exchange for the remains of two Israeli soldiers killed in Lebanon a decade earlier, Yosef Fink and Rachamim Alsheikh.

Schmidbauer, a former school headmaster from the city of Pforzheim, first got involved in Israel-Hezbollah exchanges in 1992.

Asked why Israel and Hezbollah chose Germany as an intermediary, he replied, "We had good contacts with both sides. They knew they could rely on us."

The mission was exceedingly difficult, Schmidbauer noted. "There was a lot of mistrust, which is understandable," he said in a reference to Israel's and Hezbollah's respective attitude to each other.

The Arad file, however, posed greater problems because the Israeli navigator was considered a prime catch, he suggested. As the first and only Israeli airman shot down in southern Lebanon in the post-1982 era, Arad was an extremely valuable commodity.

Hezbollah and Amal exploited his captivity to burnish their image, while Syria saw Arad as a useful intelligence source. Iran used him to goad and humiliate Israel.

Israel, which has offered a $10 million (US) reward for concrete information about Arad, has issued mixed signals regarding his fate.

Two years ago, the Winograd report concluded that Arad is alive. Last year, Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said, "Israel is closer than ever to the possibility of obtaining real information about the fate of Ron Arad."

But following the news that three bone fragments allegedly belonging to Arad did not in fact match his DNA, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon denied reports that Israel had received credible data about the navigator.

Nevertheless, a minister in Sharon's cabinet, Gideon Ezra, revealed that Germany, through the good offices of mediator Ernst Uhrlau, was still looking for Arad.

Last week, Israel announced that the search for Arad and four soldiers missing in Lebanon since 1982 and on the Golan Heights since 1997 – Yehuda Katz, Zvi Feldman, Zacharia Baumel and Guy Hever – continues undiminished.

But in the wake of that announcement, the former head of manpower in the Israel Defence Forces, Gen. Gil Regev, claimed that all four men, as well as Arad, are actually dead.

Schmidbauer said he came "very close" in 1996 to resolving the Arad case. For security reasons, he declined to be more specific.

Negotiations to free Arad could have started much earlier had Israel and Germany known exactly who held him, Schmidbauer observed.

Germany, which last negotiated an Israel-Hezbollah prisoner exchange in January 2004, is still involved in the Arad case, he said.

Schmidbauer, who met Rabin just prior to his assassination in November 1995, acknowledged that Germany and Israel maintain intensive intelligence ties in a variety of fields, including the battle against international terrorism.

Global co-operation is needed to combat the forces of Muslim radicalism, he said.

And only through dialogue and close monitoring, he argued, can the West deal effectively with Iran's quest to become a nuclear power.

Why are dairy foods a tradition on Shavuot?

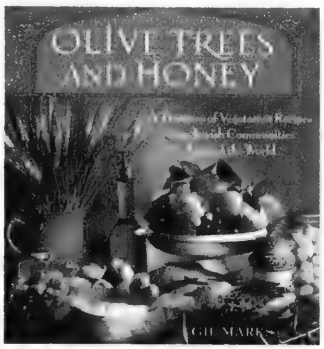
By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Cookbook author Gil Marks

When we think of Shavuot, we think of cheese, but how did this tradition begin? I asked Gil Marks, whose fascinating new cookbook, Olive Trees and Honey: A Treasury of Vegetarian Recipes from Jewish Communities Around the World (Wiley Publishing), recently won the prestigious James Beard award for best vegetarian cookbook.

"The use of dairy to celebrate this holiday is not a biblical injunction, nor is it mentioned in the Talmud," Marks said. "Shavuot falls when the animals are beginning to be weaned away from the mother, so you have a surplus of milk and therefore cheese, yogurt and dairy products. Once you have a tradition, you will find biblical reasons for it. Even in pagan pre-Christian and post-Christian holidays you will find dairy products becoming traditional because they were so abundant at this time of year."

Marks is a rabbi and historian as well as a chef, and his new book offers 300 flavourful vegetarian recipes from Jewish communities around the globe – from Mediterranean mezes (appetizers) to savoury pastries to tantalizing pastas and stews – and chronicles the fascinating culinary history of such diverse communities as India, Alsace, Greece and Uzbekistan, offering menus and interesting commentaries about the Jewish holidays and deepening our understanding of their historical context.



We learn, for example, that herdsmen of almost 6,000 years ago stored milk in the waterproof stomachs of animals (the first "bottles"). These ancient people discovered that when the milk separated, it coagulated into curds – the first fresh cheese – which not only tasted good, but lasted longer than milk. (Blintzes would come much later!)

"Remember, for most of history people didn't drink milk straight," Marks explained, "because, until pasteurization, it was dangerous unless it came straight from the animal. So fermented forms like yogurt, cheese and butter, which have a longer shelf period, are what people ate. To the Greeks, for example, one of the signs of a barbarian was somebody who drank milk."

More importantly, Shavuot commemorates the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai. "No Jews existed before the giving of the Torah," Marks said. "Technically speaking, Israelites before then were not Jews. One of the new laws concerned keeping kosher, and since their utensils and any meat products they had produced before were no longer kosher, for the first Shavuot they had to eat dairy products.

"In addition, the tradition exists that while they were at Sinai receiving the Torah, when they came back to camp, their milk had curdled into cheese, so you have a variety of mystical and somewhat biblical reasons that developed for the association with dairy."

Take blintzes, for example. "When you put two cheese blintzes together on a plate," Marks observed, "it looks like the two tablets of the law. Somebody says, 'Hey, it's the Ten Commandments.' It's a beautiful way of taking the mundane and elevating it into something special."

The only food that is actually connected biblically to the holiday is leavened wheat bread, Marks noted. "There are only two times that leavened bread, leavening of any sort, is allowed in the Temple. One is for the Thanksgiving offering and the other is for Shavuot, when two special loaves of raised wheat bread are brought in and literally raised up. Shavuot marks the end of the barley harvest and beginning of the wheat harvest, so a lot of traditional foods evolved because of what was available. The holidays have both a historical and a nature angle."

Through the years, the tradition developed to decorate both the synagogue and the home with greenery and flowers for Shavuot, Marks said. "This is in recognition of both the harvest [and] the tradition that trees flourished on Mount Sinai. The Sephardim in particular developed the use of roses, nicknaming the holiday the Festival of Roses, so they use rosewater and rose petal preserves with meals."

The Book of Ruth is read in the synagogue at Shavuot, he said, because according to tradition, Ruth was the great-great-grandmother of King David, who was born on Shavuot. "So was I, by the way," Marks added, "which makes it one of my favourite holidays!"

Another reason for the emphasis on milk is its purity, and so white foods, such as rice and white corn, are eaten in some communities at this time. Romanians, for example, will prepare mamaliga – their beloved cornmeal mush – with white corn meal instead of the usual yellow on Shavuot.

"Milk suggests the purity of the people having received the Torah," said Marks. "Not just having received it, but having accepted it and having agreed to become a holy nation, and so the idea of white fits into the whole theme of the holiday."

MIDDLE EASTERN STUFFED ZUCCHINI IN YOGURT SAUCE

6 cousa squash or thick zucchini, each 5 to 6 inches long

Stuffing:
1 cup long-grain rice, soaked in cold water to cover for 1 hour, drained and rinsed
1 cup cooked chickpeas
¼ cup olive oil or butter, melted
1 onion, chopped (optional)
1 tbsp. pine nuts (optional)
½ tsp. dried mint, crushed, or ½ tsp. ground allspice and ¼ tsp. ground cinnamon about 1 tsp. table salt or 2 tsp. kosher salt ground black pepper to taste

Yogurt sauce:
1 tbsp. cornstarch
¼ cup water
3 cups plain yogurt
1 tbsp. dried mint, crushed about 1 tsp. salt or 2 tsp. kosher salt
¼ tsp. sugar
2 to 3 cloves garlic, mashed (optional)

Cut the stem off each squash. Using a melon baller or apple corer, scoop out the pulp from the stem end to form a hollow tube straight through, leaving the sides and bottom intact. Or slit the squash lengthwise without cutting all the way through and scoop out the pulp. Use the pulp in a separate dish or add it to soups or salads.

To make the stuffing: In a medium bowl, combine the rice, chickpeas, oil, onion, pine nuts, mint, salt and pepper. Fill the zucchini three-quarters full with the stuffing, leaving room for expansion. Arrange in a single layer in a large pot or roasting pan and sprinkle any excess filling on top. Add water to cover and place an ovenproof plate on top to weigh down the squash.

Bring to a boil over medium-high heat. Cover tightly with a lid or aluminum foil, reduce the heat to low and simmer on the stove top or bake in a preheated oven at 350 until the squash and rice are tender, about 45 minutes. Drain, returning the squash to the pan. Save the cooking liquid to add to a vegetable stock.

To make the sauce: In a medium saucepan, combine the cornstarch and water; stir to blend. Stir in the yogurt. Bring to a low boil, stirring constantly, over medium heat. Reduce the heat to low and simmer, stirring constantly but gently, for 2 minutes. Add the mint, salt, sugar and if using, garlic.

Pour the sauce over the zucchini. Simmer over low heat or bake at 350, uncovered, until heated through, about 10 minutes. Serve warm. Serves 6.

The Road from Moab

Adapted from Ruth Chapter 1

This story takes place in at the time of Saul, the first king of Israel, about 2,500 years ago. Israel was at war with the Philistines.

Three women walked down the dusty road. Behind them was the land of Moab. Ahead of them lay the land of Israel. The elder woman was named Naomi, which in Hebrew means "sweet," but she was considering changing her name to Marah, which means "bitter," because of all the terrible things that had happened to her.

Not so long ago, she had been a wealthy noblewoman, married to Elimelech, a distinguished man from the land of Judah. But famine struck the land, and her family had been inundated with requests for food and charity. She told her husband, "Why don't you give to them? We have enough to give away," but he decided that he'd had enough. He packed up his possessions and left Israel, along with Naomi and their two sons, Machlon and Kilyon.

He settled in the fields of Moab, waiting for the famine to end, so he could return to Israel. He never did. Elimelech died in Moab, leaving Naomi alone with her grown sons, Machlon and Kilyon. Getting over their grief, Machlon and Kilyon each married non-Jewish Moabite princesses, Ruth and Orpah. Then Machlon and Kilyon died, leaving Naomi alone. Completely alone. And now she was returning to Israel, the land of her fathers, escorted by her former daughters-in-law, Ruth and Orpah.

They reached the road to Judah. "Thank you so much for coming with me all this way, but you should go back now," said Naomi.

"No" protested Orpah.

"We don't want to leave you," said Ruth. "We want to come with you to Israel."

They were thinking about how empty their lives had been in Moab, about the light Naomi seemed to radiate even in her grief. About how connected to God Naomi was, about the solace and strength she received from her Torah. And they wanted to be like her, too.

Naomi looked at them sadly. "You're not going to make it in Israel. You're too old — nobody's going to want to marry you. Your royal blood is meaningless there. And I don't have anything – I'll be fortunate if I get a shack to live in. I'm going to have to rummage through fields after the harvest looking for wheat to keep myself alive. Go back to the palace. Go back to your families. Your whole lives are ahead of you."

Orpah looked down. She thought of the poverty in Israel. She thought of how comfortable her life had been in Moab. And she knew she could never give it up.

"I'm...I'm going back." She embraced Naomi, and kissed her through her tears. And slowly, she slipped away, back to her mother's palace, back to her home.

Naomi and Ruth silently watched her disappear into the distance. Then Naomi spoke. "Go back with Orpah. It will be better for you. It's going to be terrible in Israel, especially for a foreigner. Go back home."

"Don't you understand?" entreated Ruth. "You are my home. I'll go wherever you go, I'll live wherever you live. I want your God to be my God." She looked into Naomi's eyes. "I'll die wherever you die. And there I will be buried. Because only death will separate us."

Naomi didn't answer. She just nodded slightly. And together the two women walked down the dusty road to Bethlehem.

Gifted filmmaker had a passion for work and life

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The late filmmaker David Stein had been such an integral part of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival that the board decided to dedicate the recent 2005 festival to his memory.

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF) also held a special tribute to the young filmmaker who died suddenly of brain cancer in December at the age of 34.

His brother, klezmer musician Eric Stein, told the more than 400 people who packed the Al Green Theatre that speeches would be kept to a bare minimum because "David's films speak for themselves."

For the tribute to Stein, 10 of his films were screened, including five trailers he made for the TJFF – one for the festival's 10th anniversary (2002), Elijah (2003), The Dress (2004), Gefilte Fish (2004) and The Obstructed View (2004); three shorts – Needle and Tread (1998), At the Exhibition (1999) and Soup (2001); and KhasenJah: The Jamaican Jewish Wedding (2003); as well as a feature documentary, Vanunu: Israel's Nuclear Spy (2003).

Stein was also honoured on the final day of the festival with the screening of his final project, Jonathan Pollard: American Fall Guy, which has aired recently on the History Channel, as well as footage of Stein shot in Israel while he was working on the Pollard piece.

TJFF executive director Helen Zukerman said rather than commission new trailers for 2005, the festival screened the trailers Stein had produced and created for the 10th, 11th and 12th years.

Zuckerman shared memories of her first meeting with Stein, who, at the time, was looking for funding to complete Needle and Tread, a film he dedicated to his grandmother, Ruth Stein, an immigrant who had worked as a seamstress in a garment factory on Spadina Avenue in the 1920s.

"What captured me was David's wonderful smile, his sparkling eyes and, most of all, his passion – his passion for his bubbie, for his work and for life," Zuckerman recalled.

Needle and Tread eventually premiered at the TJFF. "David spoke about the film and then introduced his bubbie, who was given a standing ovation by about 600 people," Zuckerman said.

"David was absolutely beaming and it wasn't until he passed away that I learned of their unique and loving relationship."

Indeed, that bond was apparent at the tribute: many of the films ended with his bubbie laughing and smiling. To quote the tribute program: "She was the source of his company's name, Tzimmes, and served as his mascot. MGM had the lion. David had his bubbie."

She died just three months after her grandson, but was never told of his death, Zukerman said. "He would have wanted it that way. They both live on through the medium of film."

A strong Jewish undercurrent along with a heightened sense of humour is evident in many of Stein's films.

The upbeat and funny Jamaican Jewish Wedding shows how joyous music – the film features the klezmer music of Beyond the Pale– can help people of diverse cultures connect with one another. This film typified Stein's interest in the juxtaposition of people of different cultures.

Another example of this juxtapositioning is in the humorous trailer Gefilte Fish. A Jewish deli is the setting for a dispute over a piece of gefilte fish between a heavily tattooed biker and an Orthodox man. They end up settling the matter with a game of rock, paper and scissors.

Feature documentaries, such as the one on Vanunu, showcased Stein's versatility as a director, and his ability to address serious subject matter.

David Stein

Documentary filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici, who produced the Vanunu and Pollard documentaries, described Stein as a gifted filmmaker. "David was an excellent director. He could make things look interesting, even if it was just the act of smoking a cigarette. He was a great talent who was going places."

Jacobovici said the two began working together about three years ago. "I connected with him as a filmmaker and as a Jew.

"I took him under my big wing. I saw myself as a mentor to him. I gave him opportunities to be involved in film projects. He had a real flare for drama. He was a natural filmmaker whose career was just taking off."

Jacobovici said in a case of real-life irony, someone in Israel who was making a documentary film on filmmaking captured Stein completing the Pollard project. "It was as if someone had a premonition about David ['s death]."

Stein's colleagues took this footage and created a DVD of him, which was screened along with the Pollard film. "They did a behind-the-scenes of the making of Pollard. It was very moving. You could see David, how charming and smart he was," Jacobovici said.

Everyone pitched in to finish the Pollard film, Jacobovici noted. "After the screening, I answered questions on David's behalf.

"I never imagined that I would be there, at the theatre première of his film without him."

Mystery writer Batya Gur dies at age 57

By SHIRI LEV-ARI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Obituary

JERUSALEM — For a person who loved and lived words, the funeral of Batya Gur was almost devoid of speech. Hundreds of family members, friends, acquaintances and others who loved her, including former students, came to the Givat Shaul cemetery in Jerusalem last Friday afternoon. Silent and weeping, they stood in front of her coffin, and afterward at her grave. Writers, poets, academics and journalists came to accompany Gur on her final journey.

Gur, a wise, sharp-eyed writer and critic who died of cancer last Thursday at the age of 57, chose to live and be buried in Jerusalem – a traditional Jewish burial.

The funeral procession was simple and restrained. In the funeral home, her husband, literary scholar Ariel Hirschfeld, thanked the doctors and nurses who took care of her during the nine months of her illness, those who "gave us hope, on which Batya relied until her last day, and the entire period of suffering was very meaningful to her," he said. He ended his words with a stanza from a Nathan Alterman poem of which Gur was especially fond:

"I will yet come to your threshold with lips extinguished. I will yet stretch out my hands to you. I will yet say to you all the good words that exist, that still exist."

Afterward, Gur's son Udi eulogized her: "You once told me that after the age of 20 or 25, a child can no longer come to his parents with complaints about what they did or didn't do to him," he said. "That is one of the many things I learned from you, and the truth is that in any case, I don't have many complaints."

He spoke about her struggle with her illness, which involved "faith and will and creativity and softness and gentleness and love and a will to live. And although the illness overcame you in the end, I feel that you were the big winner, because this struggle was won in another sense of life – it showed how one should live life, even when confronting the danger and the terror of death."

Canadian Idol judge and music industry mover and shaker Jake Gold, 47, has a talent for assessing singers – as is evident on the extremely popular CTV show, now in its third season.

Born in New Jersey to an American mother and a Canadian father, Gold was raised in North York since the age of two. What isn't as well known about Gold is that he can sing – as a teen he sang in top 40 bands.

"I used to go to B'nai B'rith camp and that is actually where I did most of my singing. I did theatre there, too, and also played B'nai Birth baseball and hockey," says Gold, who has since given up the baseball mitt and hockey stick for a tennis racquet.

He moved to Los Angeles for two years in 1979 and did lighting design for the Variety Arts Centre. He received a call from a musician friend, Coleman York, prompting a return to Toronto to become a tour manager and lighting guy for York's group Hot Tip. The band reformed itself into a mod-pop group, renamed the Purple Hearts, and asked Gold to manage it.

"I had no idea about management. The next thing you know, I was the manager and I've been doing it since 1981," says Gold, who not only runs a management and publishing business – the Management Trust – which he has owned with partner Allan Gregg since 1986 but also runs Kindling Music, which distributes CDs through EMI.

Gold is considered one of Canada's most successful artist managers. His most notable accomplishment over 25 years has been establishing and transforming the Tragically Hip into a great Canadian musical success story.

The Management Trust handles well-known musicians, including Gord Downey, lead singer of The Tragically Hip; Gold's fellow idol judge Sass Jordan; and the bands Doctor and The Populars. With his extensive resume, it is no wonder that Gold got the job when he auditioned for Canadian Idol.

Gold has garnered a number of accolades for his work in the music industry, including being recognized by the annual Canadian Music Industry Awards as manager of the year in 1991, 1993 and 1994. He has served as a member of the Juno Awards' television and talent committee since 2003.

Canadian Idol* judge Jake Gold produced the War Child concert in Winnipeg, drawing upward of 100,000 people and raising $400,000 for the War Child Canada charity.

The busy entrepreneur has been called upon as either moderator or panellist nationally and internationally at Australia's Pacific Music Conference, Pollstar's Concert Industry Consortium Vancouver's NewMusic West and Toronto's Canadian Music Week and North By Northeast.

Canadian Idol executive producer John Brunton says of Gold, "A rock 'n' roll road warrior, Jake is both all business and all heart."

Gold says, "I'm looking for great singers, I want to see performers that move me. I'm really not interested in cookie-cutter, plastic people. We have seen some great people this year on Canadian Idol. With each year, we are getting more and more artistically oriented people."

When Gold is not judging idol contestants or running his companies, he enjoys art, wine and watching and playing tennis. He has a passion for design and recently renovated the home he shares with his wife, Leesa Butler, a marketing consultant.

Gold contributes his talents to charity. He produced the War Child concert in Winnipeg, drawing upward of 100,000 people and raising $400,000 for the War Child Canada charity, which he continues to devote time to. War Child Canada provides humanitarian assistance to war-affected children globally.

Travel ministry, El Al spar over flights to Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel's Ministry of Tourism has called for additional flights from Canada and "affordable fares" to help meet increased travel demand to the Jewish state. But El Al's Canadian general manager said the airline has already increased its flights to Israel and he rejected suggestions that price is a factor in passenger loads.

In a news release issued last week, Dani Shahal, director for Canada of the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) said that after years of encouraging travel to Israel, "now there is an atmosphere of calm in Israel and the region. Travellers are again booking Israel as a destination of choice. We are cautiously optimistic that the airlines will be proactive in responding to the rapidly increasing demand for seats, flights and affordable fares."

The news release also noted that "the [Israeli] Tourism Ministry also called… for additional flights from Canada."

But Stanley Morais, the airline's general manager in Canada, said El Al has increased flights when warranted. The carrier currently flies to Israel six times a week, and on June 20, it will boost that to nine weekly flights.

In addition, the airline added flights at Sukkot, Shavuot and Passover, as well as to accommodate groups travelling to Israel, including Birthright Israel, March of the Living and Maccabi Canada.

"The Ministry of Tourism in Israel doesn't understand the requirements of the airline industry," Morais said. "They think it's a pricing issue, but it's complex."

Airlines have to account for fuel, staff costs and landing fees, and all those factors go into setting a price, he said.

In addition, Morais suggested that if price was a determining factor, the carrier's planes would not be full.

The load factor for May and June is predicted to be greater than 95 per cent and more than 90 per cent for the summer season, he said.

"At peak periods, people pay more on average," he added.

El Al's summer price ranges from $1,700 to $1,800, but a seat sale that ended in March offered summer seats for only $1,099, he said, and a "significant number" of those seats were sold.

Morais said "the Ministry of Tourism should do more to promote travel to Israel."

Jerry Adler, marketing and public relations manager for the IGTO, said he has heard concerns from the travel industry that there are not enough flights to Israel to accommodate travellers' demand. He said talks between the ministry in Israel and airlines have been ongoing on ways to meet demand and to "be proactive and plan flights for the demand."

Data released by the IGTO indicate that travel to Israel has soared in the early months of 2005 over the same period the year before. In April, 163,000 visitors entered the Jewish state, a jump of more than 20 per cent over April 2004 and roughly equal to the numbers in 2002 and 2003 combined.

"Well over half a million tourists arrived in Israel in the first four months of 2005, a 22 per cent increase over the same period in 2004," the news release stated.

"The number of Canadian visitors to Israel has also been steadily rising since 2001. Some 43,573 Canadians visited Israel in 2004, a steep increase over the 31,268 who arrived in 2003 and the 25,116 who arrived in 2002.

"From January through March of 2005, 9,000 Canadians arrived in Israel, a rise of 11 per cent over the first quarter of 2004."

Mystery writer never hesitated to express her political views

Gur was born in Tel Aviv to parents who were Holocaust survivors, grew up in Ramat Gan and studied at Tikhon Hadash high school in Tel Aviv, where she was part of a group of young men and women with a high degree of political and social awareness. She then served as a teacher-soldier in Ofakim and became aware for the first time of the situation of the development towns. For years she worked as a teacher of literature, because she believed in the power of education to shape and change people.

It was only at the age of 39 that she turned to writing, producing a detective novel, The Saturday Morning Murder (1988), which was a great success. In the book, she created the thoughtful detective Michael Ohayon, who was featured in her later detective stories as well – all of which touched, in some way or other, on the Israeli reality, on social and political problems, and on the distress of people who live on the margins of society: Literary Murder, Murder on a Kibbutz, Murder Duet, Bethlehem Road Murder and Retzah, Mitzalmim (Murder, We're Filming), her last book, which was written in the wake of the television series she wrote for Channel 2, which was directed by Ram Levi.

Over the years, Gur had dozens of pieces on literature, culture and art published in Ha'aretz. She taught writing at the Sam Spiegel Film and Television School in Jerusalem and lectured at the Hebrew University and the Open University. Her books were successful in Israel and internationally, and she was often invited to lecture abroad.

Gur never hesitated to express her political views, which were identified with the social, economic and political left. In the last two years alone, Gur was at centre stage of two incidents: first, when she told border policewomen who were holding an old Palestinian man for questioning that their behaviour reminded her of Nazi Germany, and second, when she levelled criticism, during a lecture in Brussels, at the policies of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's government, which she said encourages suicide bombers.

"Batya was a teacher for life, 100 per cent," says journalist Roni Kuban, a former student in the script-writing track at the Jerusalem film school, where Gur taught for 15 years.

"There are many people who are sharp and critical, but she left her mark – she not only wrote books and articles, she also read her students' texts, giving them an ironic smile and saying: 'Write, write,' and this gave them fuel for an entire year. There aren't many people who in addition to writing themselves, take up the torch of education as well," he says.

Bio traces bizarre life of Russian-Jewish-Muslim eccentric

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Lev Nussimbaum was one of the strangest characters of the 20th century.

The life he lived was so bizarre – and original – that it defies conventional imagination.

A Russian-born Ashkenazi Jew who became a Muslim and adopted the pseudonyms of Essad Bey and Kurban Said, he was a prolific, bestselling author.

He churned out biographies of famous men, published works about Islam and global revolution and produced the enduring novel Ali and Nino.

He also flirted with fascists in Germany and Italy.

Born in 1905 in Baku, a boomtown awash in a sea of oil, he was first and last an enigmatic figure.

"Who is this Essad Bey?" the exiled Soviet revolutionary Leon Trotsky wondered in a letter to his son in 1931, when Nussimbaum was a media star in Berlin.

A good question, of course.

In The Orientalist: Solving the Mystery of a Strange and Dangerous Life (Random House), Tom Reiss cogently explores the nooks and crannies of this highly unusual individual.

Nussimbaum, who published 16 books by the age of 30, was an Orientalist – driven by a desire to plumb the depths of Middle Eastern culture and religion and obsessed by the need to explain the East to the West.

He may well have modelled himself after the famous Jewish Orientalist Arminius Vambery, the son of a Hungarian talmudist.

Nussimbaum's father, Abraham, was a businessman whose parents had come to the Caucasus from the Pale of Settlement in the Russian empire. His mother was from Slutzk in Belorussia.

Homeschooled by a German governess after his mother's death, he grew up in a world of books. He spent hours wandering around the old Muslim walled city. His identification with Shiite Islam and the Orient began here.

He and his wealthy father fled to the West after the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution, settling in Paris, the home of White Russian emigres.

Around this period, he decided to adopt an Ottoman identity. This was hardly surprising. He had already distanced himself from his Jewish background.

In 1922, he began studying Turkish and Arabic in Berlin under the name of Essad Bey Nousimbaoum. Some of his fellow students could not resist the temptation of teasing him about his "Islamic" identity, but he could not care less.

He converted to Islam in the presence of the imam of Turkey's embassy in Berlin. Reiss offers a few theories about his conversion, but they are somewhat convoluted.

Writing as Essad Bey, he wrote his first book, Blood and Oil in the Orient, in his early 20s. More books followed – from The Caucasus: Its Mountains, People and History to Stalin: The Career of a Fanatic.

Until his untimely death at 36, he would publish an average of a book a year, including two novels under the name of Kurban Said.

Praised for their colourful style and insights, his books were international bestsellers. In a typical comment, the critic of the New York Times, reviewing Mohammed: A Biography, compared his prose to "a Persian carpet."

Lev Nussimbaum

Nussimbaum, as well, was a contributor to one of Germany's finest magazines, The Literary World, whose roster of writers ran the gamut from Bertolt Brecht to Walter Benjamin.

He wrote 144 articles for the magazine. All dealt with Islamic issues in one way or another. But no one in Berlin, be they Muslims or Nazis, was fooled by Nussimbaum's thinly disguised identity as a Muslim. Both sides attacked him mercilessly. He responded to these barbs by writing like a fiend, Reiss says.

A conservative at heart, Nussimbaum was active in right wing anti-Communist groups. One of them, the German-Russian League Against Bolshevism, had a membership consisting mainly of Nazis and Nazi sympathizers.

In addition, Nussimbaum was friends with George Sylvester Vierck, a New Yorker who was arrested as a German agent in 1942.

In 1935, Nussimbaum was expelled from the German Writers Union and informed he could no longer publish in Germany. No reason was stated, but as Reiss observes, none was needed in a country where anti-Semitism was official policy.

He cleverly circumvented the prohibition by taking a new name, Kurban Said, and wrote Ali and Nino, a story about interfaith love, still in print today.

Nussimbaum was not one to share a byline, but he made an exception for a work titled Allah is Great: The Decline and Rise of the Islamic World.

In this case, his co-author was Wolfgang von Weisl, a close associate of Vladimir Jabotinsky, the Zionist revisionist leader. Von Weisl, whose quixotic goal was to convert the Arabs to Zionism, had been the publisher of The Nile and Palestine Gazette, which folded after several editions.

Following the appearance of Ali and Nino, Nussimbaum waged a campaign to get himself invited as Benito Mussolini's biographer. He cultivated "liberal" Italian fascists to win the appointment.

But on the day he was to see the Duce, Mussolini's secretary received a tip that he was "nothing else but Leo Nussimbaum, son of Abraham." The project was summarily cancelled.

Poking around the files of the Fascist Political Police in Rome, Reiss found a letter, passed along from the Gestapo, claiming that Nussimbaum's Oriental disguise was a thinly veiled Jewish conspiracy to defame the Islamic world.

Nussimbaum lived in the Italian resort of Positano during his final years, tolerated by the Italian authorities.

He produced a memoir-cum-novel, The Man Who Knew Nothing About Love, and recorded propaganda speeches in Farsi for the Fascist Colonial Service. Nussimbaum died in Positano, but his father was placed on a train to Poland and was most likely murdered in the Treblinka death camp.

Reiss tells his tale with verve, but The Orientalist is far too long. A better editor would have deleted the majority of his questionable digressions and tightened his narrative.

Nevertheless, this is an engaging book about an extremely odd but talented man who never quite found his place in the world.

Life – 'Chapter 2' – begins at 40

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Life is going to throw you curveballs, says Lisa Colt. "You can catch them and throw them back or let them drop, but ultimately you have control."

Her bat mitzvah in the late 1970s taught her that lesson. It was "a powerful experience, but not for the reason you would think," she said in an interview at Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, where she is executive director. Her father, Harvey Abrams, was in the hospital, and her bat mitzvah had to be cancelled and rescheduled.

"I learned a lot about myself and what I can handle… Being told you've got to start all over again is huge for a kid."

The 40-year-old mother of three – she rolls her eyes in disbelief when she says her age – has been dealing with several challenges in the past year, most notably separation after 16 years of marriage, and her father's illness this winter. Also, she took on her current position as executive director at Kolel in March after being promoted from program director.

Lately, she has been attending synagogue services more often. "I'm finding comfort in that."

But Colt arrived at a feeling of religious connection with her Judaism relatively late. "I had an underlying negative feeling about Judaism," she said, recalling her days as a youngster in the Reform movement.

What Judaism meant for her in a positive way was "family more than anything," she said.

Despite her position at Kolel, she says with wry humour that she sees herself as the "lowest common denominator" at the popular adult Jewish education centre.

What she means in practical terms, however, is that she herself can serve as a litmus test for the viability of new programming. If a program meets her needs and is something she will find enjoyable, then she figures a lot of other people are likely to react the same way.

Her instincts are sound, according to Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Kolel's director, who said Colt's suggestions included a Chanukah art and gift show at A Show of Hands gallery, a Hallowe'en night program on Judaism and superstition, a "Breakfast with Bigshots" speaker series and a mother-daughter book club.

Colt, who was already familiar with Kolel as a student and High Holy Day service attendee, was hired as program director in 2003 despite her lack of background in either Jewish studies or programming.

"She came in with a thousand ideas and tremendous marketing skills," recalls Rabbi Goldstein. "And she 'gets' us. She understands what people want, and is deeply respectful of Kolel's spiritual mandate."

Two things reconnected Colt to Judaism after her teen years, during which she had virtually no Jewish involvement, she said. One was her marriage in 1988 and her related desire to establish a Jewish home; the other was Hadassah-WIZO.

She joined the organization because of a desire to volunteer and because some friends were involved. She found she had a flair for marketing, programming and event planning, and eventually chaired a major fundraiser with Bill Clinton as guest speaker. A 10-day trip to Israel in 2002, when she was one of two women selected to represent the national organization at the World Zionist Congress, triggered an unexpected spiritual connection.

As a result, she felt a firmer commitment to Judaism that is manifesting itself in her love of working for a Jewish organization, giving her children a strong Jewish identity and feeling "more grounded" about her own identity.

When she first attended Kolel to take a course called "Now that your kids are in day school," she was "very much Judaism 101," she said. "I loved the fact it was so non-judgmental and so welcoming. At no point did I feel I'd be made to feel stupid."

She credits Rabbi Goldstein and Rabbi Yossi Sapirman, spiritual leader of Beth Torah Congregation, where she is now a member, for opening doors for her to "accept Judaism on [my] own level. For me, this has been really profound. By letting me find my own way, it has gotten me turned on to observing Judaism more and learning more."

Rabbi Sapirman said he thinks Colt has "an uncommon honesty" about her Judaism. "She absolutely wants to integrate Judaism into her life, and that requires a lifelong journey of learning, growth and honesty. Lisa has taken on this journey with great enthusiasm."

Lisa Colt

It's rare, he said, "and it's even more rare to see it so thoroughly transmitted to children, which is what she's done such a wonderful job of."

Colt said that her 13-year-old son, and two daughters, age 10 and 9, are "definitely growing up in a more affiliated, religiously identified home than I did, and I think that they'll have, growing up, a stronger Jewish identity than I did."

She herself had resisted traditional, institutionalized Judaism. "I didn't connect with it, and yet through other opportunities, I slowly made my way back and am now able to embrace Judaism on a level that's comfortable for me. I actually go for Shabbat services, not regularly but not just on the High Holy Days, and I enjoy them. Also, Shabbat plays an important role in our family's life. I change over my dishes at Passover… I always watched my mother doing that."

Colt trained as a respiratory therapist in the mid-1980s, then worked in a downtown teaching hospital for five years before leaving for a home-care company, a job which also involved medical sales and marketing. "I really enjoyed that," she says of the latter experience.

In 2000 she put together a trade show at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre to teach consumers about online shopping – an idea that she came up with and pitched to a communications company single-handedly. About 8,000 people attended.

Experiences like that "really push you forward in life," she said.

Colt describes herself as the type of person who "always seeks challenges."

At Kolel, she hopes to work toward increasing the amount of joint programming with other organizations. "One thing I don't like is when there's… competition between the different organizations. We should be really working together to reach out to the community."

She describes her father, her mother, Elaine Abrams, and aunt, community volunteer Susan Fenwick, as role models.

Her mother "rises to the occasion whenever she has to," said Colt. "She has tremendous strength of character and always finds the humour in things."

Her father has also risen above various challenges and landed on his feet, she said. "He has been a source of strength and inspiration."

Her 40th birthday itself wasn't traumatic, said Colt, but "you do a lot of reassessing and soul-searching. I hope I've made some good choices, and that Chapter 2 will be equally exciting and entertaining. That's how I look at life."

Yoga – ancient healing for modern problems

By SHELLEY MILLMAN HERMAN

I first discovered the amazing benefits of yoga practice in my late teens when I took a three-month yoga program. The instructor was what one would call a "yogi," that is, someone who practices yoga for many hours a day.

Back then, and now, I needed to learn how to relax, and as each week of yoga class passed, I began to feel tensions lifting away. I'll never forget how the instructor would end each class with the beautiful high-pitched, reverberating sound of her voice, which would send shivers up our spines after our having spent 1½ hours stretching, deep breathing and relaxing.

Nowadays, although I teach yoga occasionally, I am an incredibly busy person. Except for the occasional luxury of spending an extended period of time on yoga, I get only a few minutes each day to do my yoga stretches. Throughout the day, wherever I sense tightness in my body, I stretch that area.

My long-term yoga practice has taught me to be attuned to my body and to address, in constructive ways, whatever tensions I might be feeling physically. As well, as a wonderful conclusion to my nearly daily strenuous aerobic workouts, I do some yoga stretches and deep breathing.

Since I owe so much of my well-being to yoga practice – along with my high-energy workouts and a healthy diet – I thought I would devote this month's column to a discussion of yoga practice and the related benefits.

According to the teachings of yoga, there is no separation between the body and the mind, which is why all yoga's teachings begin at the physical level. Hatha yoga, which is what I practise, maintains the focus on the physical, with postures and proper breathing techniques aimed at physical well-being. In turn, physical well-being leads to mental well-being.

Yoga can be used as an antidote for the mental and physical tension associated with the fast pace of Western living.

Yoga is an alternative to reaching for relief through medication when dealing with many discomforts. Gentle yoga doesn't have side effects; it doesn't result in muscular aches and pains or cause undue fatigue, and there are no allergic or other kinds of negative reactions. And wonderfully, there are no age limits for the practice of yoga! In fact, yoga practice can prevent many of the problems that are associated with aging.

Physical well-being leads to mental well-being

It is amazing how many benefits can be reaped from regular yoga practice. They include improved circulation, greater flexibility, improved muscle tone and lung capacity, higher levels of energy, sounder and more restful sleep, reduced stress, pain control, rejuvenation, detoxification, relaxation and prevention of illness.

Given the extensive benefits that one can enjoy with regular yoga practice, my advice would be to get out there and try it – your body will forever thank you!

Special needs youngsters celebrate bar/bat mitzvahs

At their bar/bat mitzvahs, they each made a presentation about a biblical personality they had studied and felt some connection to. As an award for their efforts, the boys received a kiddush cup and the girls got a silver bracelet with Jewish-theme charms.

The ceremony was the culmination of a 22-week program operated by the Friendship Circle. Children from across the Greater Toronto Area, from the ages of 11 to 13, participated. This is the first time the program, which follows a format developed by Chabad of Michigan, has been offered in Ontario.

Once a week for two hours these youngsters were engaged in activities that helped them to learn basic tenets of Judaism, brachot and their rich heritage. With a dedicated volunteer by their sides, they learned about Jewish heroes and heroines.

For many of the participants, it was the first time they had joined a community program catering to those with special needs.

The six-month-long program, whose goal is to strengthen Jewish identity and transmit traditional values, was run by Tova and Ari Moskowitz.

In addition to an adventure into Judaism, the program includes a weekly life-skills component as well as music and occupational therapy.

The Friendship Circle program, which serves as a model used by some 30 branches of Chabad, brings together children with special needs and teenage mentors.

The teenage volunteers, who have been carefully screened and interviewed at length, visit the homes of the youngsters weekly and establish a bond with them through activities such as making crafts and playing computer games or sports.

For more information, contact Friendship Circle at 905-731-7000, ext. 35, or visit.www.friendshipcircle@chabad.ca.

Executive Assistant

The New Israel Fund, an international organization that promotes democracy and social justice in Israel, is seeking an Executive Assistant for our Toronto office.

The Executive Assistant will be responsible for all aspects of office administration, responding to inquiries about NIF and its grantees, maintaining and managing the donor database, receipting and acknowledging gifts, performing routine banking and monitoring financial accounts and transactions, coordinating logistics for donor and public events, interacting with donors and volunteers, executing mailings, and supporting the Executive Director and the Board of Directors.

The successful candidate will be a professional who is flexible, motivated, and detail oriented, who is able to work in a self-directed environment and possesses excellent communication and financial management skills. Superior computer skills, including Microsoft Word, Outlook and Excel are essential. Non-profit and fundraising experience is helpful as well as a facility in using Raiser's Edge. An interest in Israel and social justice issues is a strong asset.

Please forward your résumé to: Jay Brodbar, Executive Director The New Israel Fund of Canada, 801 Eglinton Ave. W., Ste. 401, Toronto, ON M5N 1E3. Fax: 416-781-7443 – email: info@nifcan.org to you or the charity of your choice, if you will introduce me to the lady I want to meet and possibly marry, because she may not read or answer this ad. She is 75-78, trim, petite and nice looking. She plays bridge and golf, and would fit into my exciting international country club lifestyle. She would supervise two beautiful contemporary homes with live-in help.

I am from out-of-town. I am very nice looking, trim, kind, considerate, very active, golf, bridge, theatre, travel. I have lots of friends, but it's a couples world and I need her to share with me a very interesting, happy and outstanding social life. Please write with your phone number, and a snap would expedite our meeting. I promise we will never, never be lonely again.

Please reply to CJN Box #5033.

Coast to Coast

Jewish leaders wanted a meeting with Parizeau

he said little publicly about politics, but he was a strong supporter of Canadian unity through his foundation.)

Le Hir quotes Parizeau as saying: "Listen, if Charles Bronfman stays quiet during the referendum campaign, I will be ready to meet the leaders of the Jewish community. Pass the message."

Le Hir, who was first elected in the September 1994 vote that returned the PQ to power after nine years in opposition, says Jewish leaders wanted a meeting with Parizeau because they were worried about community institutions.

Upon his election, Parizeau immediately announced his intention to hold a referendum. Le Hir was minister responsible for restructuring.

In 1993, as director general of the Quebec Manufacturers Association, Le Hir was invited on a Canada-Israel Committee-sponsored trip to Israel, and he developed a rapport with CIC-Quebec president Thomas Hecht.

Through Hecht, whom Le Hir describes as being a little taken aback by Parizeau's demand, Le Hir met with Senator Leo Kolber, Bronfman's longtime right-hand man, at Kolber's home.

"I was particularly sensitive to the surrealistic side of the situation. Sen. Kolber was a very influential man in the ranks of the federal Liberal party. And here I was about to ask him to approach Mr. Bronfman to suggest to him to adopt a low profile during the referendum campaign!"

According to Le Hir, Kolber told him Bronfman was not the type to have anyone dictate how he should behave, but he said he would talk to him.

As it turned out, Bronfman never said anything in the intervening months.

A few weeks before the referendum, Le Hir said, he reminded Parizeau of the commitment the premier made to meet the Jewish community.

Le Hir quotes Parizeau's response: "The referendum is nearing and I must concentrate all my efforts on the 'Tabarnacos' [a derogatory term Parizeau used to refer to so-called soft nationalists]… [vice-premier Bernard] Landry is dealing with the Jews."

Parizeau then told Le Hir that the next day he, Parizeau, would be meeting with the Jewish community in Boisbriand, the Tasher Chassidim.

"I couldn't believe my ears. Not only was he going back on a commitment that he had incited me to transmit to the leaders of the Montreal Jewish community, a community he knew had every reservation about the sovereignty project and must overcome hostility, but there he was showing the most profound contempt for people he was about to solicit votes from."

Le Hir told The CJN that he brought up any further comments on his accusations.

Bronfman never said anything in the intervening months

Parizeau's comments 10 years later because he is still sorry Parizeau did not keep his promise and because of the former premier's "insulting" behaviour to the Jewish community. "It was totally wrong, it was cheating, especially when you're talking about a community you know you have a bad rapport with."

Le Hir said, however, that he did not at the time find it peculiar that Parizeau asked a citizen to forgo his freedom of speech in exchange for meeting other citizens that the premier was elected to represent. "In politics it happens all the time, on both sides. Everything is bought and traded."

He said he never found out if Kolber relayed Parizeau's message or if Bronfman paid any attention to it.

Le Hir also said that meeting with the Tasher Chassidim, a "marginal" group that's not involved in community decision-making, shows how poorly PQ leaders understood the Jewish community.

As well, Le Hir said his revelation sheds new light on Parizeau's thinking when he blamed "money and the ethnic vote" for the narrow defeat of the sovereignty option in 1995.

On referendum night in 1995, Le Hir told Radio-Canada that Parizeau's declaration was "unacceptable."

He left cabinet 10 days later, and he resigned from the PQ caucus the next month to sit as an independent. He did not seek re-election and left the sovereignty movement. Today, Le Hir, 57, is a business consultant.

Kolber told The CJN he has no recollection of Le Hir making such a request of him or even coming to his house. "He may be right in what he says, but I just don't remember. At that time, we were holding 40 or 50 dinners a year at our house. I can't confirm or deny it, but it sounds plausible."

Hecht, whom Le Hir says was the person who came to him initially to seek a community meeting with Parizeau, said he does remember making the introduction between Le Hir and Kolber and being at Kolber's home the night he hosted Le Hir. Hecht, however, said he was not privy to any conversation Kolber and Le Hir may have had about Bronfman, and knew nothing about Parizeau's alleged request to muzzle Bronfman.

Kolber said it was not likely Bronfman would have made any public comment during the 1995 referendum.

"After 1976, he did not want to put himself on public display again."

Efforts to reach Bronfman and Parizeau for comment were unsuccessful, but Parizeau's assistant Pierre Rousseau said that, in general, the former premier did not not want to comment on the Le Hir article.

Louis-Pascal Cyr, Landry's press attaché, said the current PQ leader "gives no credibility to Le Hir at all, but he is not making

Cammalleri led AHL in goal scoring in 2004-05

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Mike Cammalleri has excelled at pretty well every level of hockey he's played in, and after a monster 106-point year in the American Hockey League (AHL), success in the NHL remains his final frontier.

Cammalleri's been up and down with the Los Angeles Kings, the team that selected him in the second round – 49th overall – of the 2001 Entry draft, but he hasn't really stuck yet.

As a rookie with the Kings in the 2002-03 season, he played 28 games before being injured. During the next season he played 31 games and scored nine goals and six assists.

But it's been with the Manchester Monarchs, the Kings' AHL affiliate, where his success has been most pronounced. In 13 games during his rookie pro season, he scored 20 points, and last season he racked them up at a rate of a point per game, scoring 39 in 41 games.

This past season was something of a breakout year, however. He battled highly regarded Jason Spezza, an Ottawa Senator property and a good friend, for the scoring championship, coming second overall but finishing as the AHL's top goal scorer with 46 in 79 games.

In six playoff games, he scored six points, but the Atlantic Division-leading Monarchs were upset by the Providence Bruins in the first round.

He's back home in Richmond Hill now, decompressing from an intense hockey season and wondering what might have been had there been no lockout in the NHL.

As with most professional hockey players, next season remains something of a mystery. The lockout, he said, has been "terrible for everybody, for fans, for industry that thrives on hockey, and I don't think it will have a positive effect in the United States."

"It's hard on us," he continued. "We play our whole lives. Our careers aren't very long and you want to enjoy it as much as you can."

Only 22, Cammalleri no doubt has many good seasons ahead of him. And he has all the tools necessary for success – he's fast, he's aggressive, he's competitive, he's smart with the puck, and he's equally adept at scoring goals and setting up linemates.

His coach in Manchester, former Toronto Maple Leaf Bruce Boudreau, said Cammalleri was his go-to guy in pretty well every situation, particularly in the second half of the season. "If I needed a big face off, Mike was out there. If I needed a penalty killed, Mike was out there. If I needed regular strength points, Mike was out there."

As a result of Cammalleri's dominant role on the team – he finished 35 points ahead of the second leading point-getter – a lot of other teams took runs at him.

"He put up with a lot of crap," Boudreau said.

But one of Cammalleri's main intangibles is that "he's an incredibly competitive young man. He wants to win, he wants to be the best in every situation. He wants to be leaned on," the coach added.

Despite Cammalleri's modest stature – he's five-foot-nine, 188 lbs. – Boudreau believes Cammalleri has a legitimate shot at being an NHL regular. It was only injuries that ended his seasons with the Kings, he said.

And when it comes to the skill department, there are few who are better than Cammalleri, he continued. His anticipation and puck smarts are tremendous, Boudreau said. "He's the smartest player I've had the good fortune to coach. He sees the ice well. He can take a one-timer better than any player I've seen."

Cammalleri has always been a top player. Skating for the University of Michigan Wolverines, he was a Central Collegiate Hockey Association (CCHA) first team all-star and a NCAA West second team all-American in 2001. The next year, he was named a CCHA first team all-star and was a NCAA West first team all-American.

At the 2002 World Junior Championship in the Czech Republic, he led the tournament with seven goals and four assists, but Canada finished second. The year before in Moscow, he earned a bronze medal as a member of the Canadian team while racking up six points in seven games.

The visit to the Czech Republic brought him to the homeland of one of his maternal grandparents. His grandparents on his mother's side are Holocaust survivors and he accompanied his "Bub," Adele Gelbard, to a recent 60th anniversary commemoration of the liberation of Europe.

Mike Cammalleri

His father's family is originally from Sicily and Cammalleri said both his mom's (Ruth Gelbard's) and his father's heritages are respected at home.

Growing up in Woodbridge and Richmond Hill, Cammalleri was something of a hockey prodigy. He started skating at three and by age 11, he was playing AAA hockey in the MTHL for the Toronto Red Wings.

At 15, he was a star for the Junior A Bramalea Blues. He was so good he was already being courted by several U.S. college and OHL teams.

He chose the U.S. college route and after fast-tracking his way through high school – he finished in three years instead of four – he joined the Wolverines at age 17 for the 1999-2000 season.

The way he talks about it now, he couldn't have made a better decision. "It was just paradise for a kid that age.

"I wanted to be part at the University of Michigan. I just wanted the lifestyle. It was the best three years of my life."

In three seasons with Michigan, he scored 65 goals and 131 points in 110 career games.

He signed with the Kings prior to his senior year. At the time, Kings' GM Dave Taylor said "Michael was generally regarded as the best player in college hockey this past season."

In his first game in the NHL, in Ottawa, he earned an assist, setting up Mathieu Schneider, one of the few Jews in the league, for a goal.

Cammalleri is confident he has a bright future in the NHL. Had it not been for the lockout, he believes he'd have played for the Kings.

"I know where I belong," he said. "In the NHL."

Olympic swimmer to head U.S. Maccabiah team

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Olympic gold medalist Lenny Krayzelburg will serve as captain of the U.S. team at this summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Maccabiah USA officials said last week that Krayzelburg was given the honour in part because he skipped the 2001 World Championships to be flag bearer for the American team during the 2001 Maccabiah Games. Thousands of athletes from around the world will take part in the July competition.

MIAMI — The Florida Marlins recently hosted a Jewish day at the ballpark. At last Sunday's game against the New York Mets in Miami, Israel's national anthem was to be sung in addition to The Star-Spangled Banner. Glatt kosher snacks, including hot dogs, falafel and Chinese food, were also served in the ol' ball park.

Stronach's self-assurance makes her a role model

Since I was little, I've often been accused of overanalysing situations, driving myself crazy by thinking things through until they no longer made any sense to me.

I used to think my "over-reactionary" tendencies had a lot to do with being insecure and so, it made sense that I would always be second-guessing everything about myself.

Now, I think I was probably just trying to get a clear picture of the kind of girl I am.

By SANDIE BENITAH

I used to have this wonderful English teacher who made his students giggle by explaining that we should drop the "I think" from our essays and from our vocabulary.

"Of course you think, dummy, that's why you're saying it," he would say.

So let me rephrase.

There. A little more of a bold statement but a much scarier one to make.

As I'm starting my career in the field of journalism, where your words and ideas are out there for everyone to see, I can't help but take a step back after every word I write and every idea I put forth as it is often through this column and other stuff that I write that I begin to understand what and who is Sandie Benitah.

However, it's not so easy to take a step back from conversations with people.

At work the other day, I got a letter from an angry gentleman who didn't like a story I wrote about his favourite politician. My boss patted me on the back for stirring up controversy and at home, my mom patted my back and tried to stop my tears.

That didn't stop me from going over the story again and again, poring over each detail and scrutinizing where I might have interjected a bias.

Here I was, second-guessing myself and my research because one person, one stranger, took offence to something I said. But as I looked through my words, I knew I wasn't really searching for a mistake that I had made. I was looking for signs that maybe, throughout this journey, I had somehow become a person who was jaded, mean-spirited and ignorant.

Soon after, the news hit about Conservative member of Parliament Belinda Stronach crossing the parliamentary floor to the Liberals, and right away, I saw just how crucial self-assurance can be. Stronach has always been somewhat of a role model for me because she has never been afraid to wear pink while being a powerhouse. She puts herself on the line without making any apologies for who she is, and when people treat her as a sex symbol and ignore her insights and articulate ideas, she continues to stand on the public podium with the same dress, the same smile and the same views as if she is deaf to public opinion. While other politicians survive only on conforming to the popular view of the day, Belinda knows who she is and is her own biggest supporter, and for that, she's an incredible force all on her own.

In journalism, when the job is to write about other people, it's easy to stop questioning the kind of person you have become, and I guess to that end, it's easy to understand why journalists are considered to be the most hated people, along with politicians. To that end, I hope I never do stop second-guessing myself, but at some point in my life, as a journalist or as a young woman, or as anything I want to be, I know that if I don't stand firmly behind my convictions, my words, my self, I certainly can't expect anybody else to do so either.

ZUCCHINI-APPLE BULGUR

3/4 c water
2/3 c apple juice
3/4 c bulgur
1 c apple, chopped
1 c zucchini, chopped
1/2 tsp salt
1/2 tsp cinnamon

Heat water and apple juice to boiling, add bulgur, and return to boil. Reduce heat and simmer 20 minutes, until liquid is absorbed. While bulgur is cooking, saute the apple and zucchini (your preference, peeled or not) using a bit of apple juice or water, until softened. Stir in the salt and cinnamon, then add the cooked bulgur.

Yield: 4 servings.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I recently went out for dinner with a group of friends and we got into a discussion about tipping. It's amazing how diverse the opinions were. I know there is an acceptable amount most people tip, but it's amazing how many people don't know! Could you please list appropriate tipping information. I would appreciate it.

Tipping Tips

Dear Tipping Tips,

This topic has come up a few times, so after doing a bit of research, here is what I came up with.

- Restaurants – 15-20 per cent before tax. I always add up the taxes on the bill and leave that. If the service is terrible, speak to the manager and remember not to blame the server for mistakes made in the kitchen.
- Wine steward – 10 per cent of the wine bill.
- Maitre d' – no tip unless you get a special table, or come in without a reservation, then $5-$20 depending on the restaurant.
- Coat check – $1
- Restroom attendant – $1
- Valet parking – $1-$2, given when car is returned.
- Buffet or self-serve – it is not necessary to tip unless there is some service, then tip 10 per cent.
- Food delivery – 10-15 per cent of total bill, but not less than $2.
- Taxis – 10-15 per cent of total. Not less than $1.
- Barber – $2-$3.
- Hair stylist or colourist – 10-20 per cent. Shampoo or other assistant – $2-$5 each person.
- Manicure or facial – 15 per cent
- Massage therapist – No tip if at doctor's office. 10-15 per cent otherwise.
- Spa package – If gratuities are not included, then 10-20 per cent split among the service providers. This is a great time to use those little envelopes at the front desk.

Owners who provide any of the above services should be tipped as shown above.

Common sense must play a role as well. Tip more for exemplary service and less for poor service. These amounts should be used only as a guide. Tipping is still a way of saying thank you to the people working in the service industry.

Ending bullying through LOVE

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

In 1993, Sheila (Twinkle) Rudberg and her husband witnessed a petty theft in the streets of Montreal. Mr. Rudberg prevailed upon the thief. He was stabbed to death by the young teen.

After the murder, the courageous widow became curious about the 14-year-old who killed her beloved husband. She discovered that his mother was rarely around and he had run away and joined a gang.

Twinkle saw the boy as a victim and began taking a daring stand against violence and bullying among youth, with the hope of finding ways to help them through compassion and caring.

Out of this was born LOVE (Leave out ViolenceE) – a non-profit organization that develops violence prevention programs by taking young people who have had direct experience with violence and training them to promote non-violence in our communities.

Today, LOVE operates in Toronto, Montreal, Halifax, Vancouver and New York City. Its staff of 25 have trained more than 1,000 youth – through such creative programs as its photojournalism and broadcast journalism course – who subsequently have taught more than 35,000 others about the ills of bullying, and about methods to overcome anger and the inclination to intimidate others.

Dana Zosky is executive director of LOVE's Ontario office. A highly energetic person who beams when she speaks about LOVE, Zosky says the organization has helped raise the self-esteem of many reformed bullies and victims of bullying, and encouraged them to continue on to post-secondary educational programs.

"Many," she adds, "would otherwise have practised self-mutilation, continued to fight and isolate themselves from their parents, or be dead."

The need for LOVE is crucial. Surveys show that up to 30 per cent of children in school have been bullied, and 10 per cent have been bullied relentlessly. Further, studies show that many bullying victims take their own lives rather than return to the terror they suffer in school.

Zosky adds that while bullying occurs regularly in high-risk neighbourhoods, many private schools, including Jewish ones (where LOVE has held workshops), exhibit similar problems. (Recently, a Jewish day school caught three of its students beating up a fellow student and called the police.)

LOVE's literature states that schools are not set up to fight bullying and that the vast majority of students are "good," but often remain silent when challenged by this issue. LOVE's brochures and newsletters also note that bullying happens at most schools, and it happens among boys and girls.

Kosky says female bullies can be ruthless, using verbal and emotional intimidation on students they perceive as weak. Female bullies have also been known to publish websites showing pictures of a victim in compromising positions, or writing "bitch" or "slut" on a person's locker.

Kosky says there are no innocent bystanders when it comes to bullying and violence in schools. Although she doesn't agree with the extreme nature of "zero tolerance" polices toward violence, she believes anti-bullying policies and quick and effective responses are key.

Kosky advises students who witness bullying to collectively approach the bully and tell the person to stop. She says bullies get power from groups and if they are alone, or challenged, they will often stop their shameful behaviour.

LOVE is an inspiring organization. It has worked with school superintendents, principals, guidance counsellors, teachers, parents, police and, of course, young people. It also publishes ONE LOVE, a newspaper distributed to more than 100,000 people through schools, libraries and health clinics. In 2002, LOVE was the recipient of the Mayor's Community Saftey Award for its work in youth violence prevention.

MAKING PEACE: Inspired by their common heritage in the patriarch Abraham, more than 480 Arab and Jewish children, aged 9 to 11 come together at the Bible Lands Museum in Jerusalem in a special program called the "Image of Abraham Project." The children are pupils at local schools. The project, now entering its eighth year, aims to create understanding and respect between Arabs and Jews at a young age through shared history and culture. [Israel photo]

Capacity crowd attends Jewish Book Awards night

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

As he accepted the top fiction prize at the Canadian Jewish Book Awards, Toronto author David Bezmozgis noted the special appropriateness of receiving such an honour so close to the thriving Russian-Jewish community he writes about in his internationally acclaimed collection Natasha and Other Stories.

"It's something special for me to be standing here because the stories are written up and down Bathurst Street," he told the capacity crowd at the Leah Posluns Theatre on May 30. He also said that since Isaac Bashevis Singer had spoken some Yiddish when accepting his Nobel prize, he, too, would venture to speak a few words of Russian, as his grandfather and parents were in the audience.

"I was surprised by the size of the turnout," Bezmozgis told The CJN. "I hadn't expected it to be such a large event. The hall was packed, so it was very encouraging. I think it's great that these awards exist."

The presence of the 31-year-old locally grown literary sensation was not the only factor to lend an aura of big-league excitement to the 17th annual awards, which drew its biggest audience ever. This year's awards ceremony was the first to benefit from a generous operating grant from Lillian and Norman Glowinsky in memory of Lillian's parents, Helen and Stan Vine.

Hamas are terrorists: Martin

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Hamas cannot be a regarded as a player in the Palestinian political process until it disarms, Prime Minister Paul Martin emphasized in an interview with The CJN.

"Let's not waffle. Hamas are terrorists. Period. Terrorism is incompatible with democracy… They should lay down their arms," Martin said.

'They should lay down their arms'

Martin, however, was not as categorical on whether the Canadian government's position might change if Hamas wins significant support in the Palestinian Legislative Council elections scheduled for July 17. He said he cannot "anticipate" the outcome of the election or answer "hypothetical" questions.

Asked if Palestinian Authority leader Mahmoud Abbas has done enough to rein in Hamas and other groups using violence, Martin replied: "I think he has made great progress. He should be encouraged to do more. We have to be very supportive of him."

Martin described the election of Abbas in January as "a window of opportunity… It is important that he succeeds."

Martin did not backtrack from his firm statement during Abbas' visit to Ottawa in May that Israel's settlements are illegal, but he did describe Israel's planned disengagement from Gaza and part of the West Bank as a "major move" that also must succeed.

"The pullout from Gaza has got to go well. Very clearly, Israel's building settlements is not acceptable under the road map," Martin said.

Rabbi Gets Award

TORONTO — Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinic director and founder of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning in Toronto, has been named one of three recipients of the 15th annual Covenant awards for outstanding Jewish educators in North America. The awards, worth $25,000 each to the winners and an additional $5,000 each to their institution, will be presented in November at the United Jewish Communities General Assembly in Toronto. The New York-based Covenant Foundation was set up in 1990 by the Crown Family Foundation and the Jewish Education Service of North America.

Cdn. Mission to Cuba

HAVANA — The Toronto-based Canadian Friends of Cuban Jewry (CFCJ) recently completed its 91st mission to Cuba. In addition to bringing supplies and humanitarian aid, the group helped a young local man, Shimon Barrocas, who had been studying in the CFCJ's student placement program, get married and travel to Buenos Aires, where he enrolled in rabbinical college.

Firm Wins Contract

TEL AVIV — Ormat Technologies has won a contract to build a $9.2 million (US), five-megawatt power plant fuelled by recovered energy for an unnamed pipeline company in Western Canada, the Israeli energy firm said last week. The plant will convert waste heat from an existing gas turbine on the Canadian company's pipeline into electrical power.

Malta Mikvah Saved

VALLETTA, Malta — Malta's only mikvah has been saved. The 80 Jewish families on the Mediterranean island were told the mikvah building would be sold unless they raised $40,000 (US). A New York donor linked to Chabad Lubavitch donated $25,000 and local Jews raised the rest. The donor, who has no other link to Malta, was said to be moved by the late Lubavitcher Rebbe's words that a community must have a mikvah, even if it's just for one woman.

Rabbi Speaks in Syria

JERUSALEM — An American Orthodox rabbi took part in a televised, interfaith conversation in Syria. On a panel with Muslim and Christian leaders, Rabbi Marc Gopin spoke May 25 about Judaism and peace at the Arab Authors Union in Damascus, the Jerusalem Post reported. It was his second bridge-building trip to Syria this year. "There has never been a meeting like this before, not only of the three religions but also with a group that can ask questions," said Rabbi Gopin, an academic and head of the Center for World Religions and Diplomacy at Virginia's George Mason University, referring to the dozens of people in the audience.

'Deep Throat' Is Not Jewish

NEW YORK — A former FBI agent who outed himself as Watergate's "Deep Throat" is not Jewish, contrary to what former U.S. president Richard Nixon and his aides believed.

Mark Felt, 91, revealed himself to Vanity Fair magazine late last month as the man who selectively leaked information to the Washington Post in the 1970s-era Watergate scandal. The leaks led to Nixon's resignation and made "Deep Throat" the best-known anonymous source of the last century.

Nixon, who clashed with Felt over the FBI's refusal to use questionable means to track down leaks, came to suspect that Felt leaked information.

In a 1972 conversation recorded on tapes made by Nixon, top aide H.R. Haldeman tells Nixon that Felt is Jewish. Nixon expresses shock that a Jew could have reached such a senior post, and speculates that Felt – former FBI director J. Edgar Hoover's right-hand man – might be leaking information because he is Jewish.

In fact, Felt is of Irish ancestry and has no religious affiliation, news coverage of his admission stressed last week.

Citizenship Stripped

MILWAUKEE — The U.S. citizenship of a former Nazi concentration camp guard was revoked. Yugoslav-born Josias Kumpf, 80, of Racine, Wisc., testified in court that in 1943 he stood guard at a pit containing dead and wounded Jews with orders to kill anyone who tried to escape. He was also an armed guard at the Sachsenhausen concentration camp and an SS labour camp in Poland. He plans to appeal.

Khodorkovsky Jailed

MOSCOW — In a widely expected decision, a Russian court last week sentenced Jewish oil magnate Mikhail Khodorkovsky, Russia's richest man, to nine years in jail after finding him guilty of six charges, including tax evasion, fraud and embezzlement. Khodorkovsky's business partner, Platon Lebedev, a non-Jew, was also given nine years on the same charges. Most observers say Khodorkovsky wasn't targeted because he is Jewish, but many Jews feel his trial led to a rise in anti-Semitic sentiment in Russia.

USDS to consolidate its three campuses

Enrolment down over 200 students in two years

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Faced with an enrolment drop of more than 200 students in two years, United Synagogue Day School last week unveiled a plan to combine three campuses into two for September 2006.

The mood at the school's annual general meeting, held last Thursday at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, was tense as USDS board president Allen Gales described how USDS' Richmond Hill campus – on Bayview Avenue north of Weldrick Road – and its Bayview campus – at Beth Tikvah Synagogue south of Finch Avenue – will merge and be housed at Beth Tikvah for the 2006-07 school year.

Meanwhile, USDS will try to sell the Richmond Hill campus, which is also home to Beit Rayim Synagogue.

The Bathurst campus, located at Beth Tzedec Congregation south of Eglinton Avenue, will undergo an extensive $18-million renovation to add more classrooms, a gym and underground parking. To date, $6.1 million has been raised to finance that renovation.

At Bathurst and Weldrick, USDS' new northern branch will join a new Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) campus and Jewish Community Centre (JCC) on the northern site of UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) development.

The Vaughan campus is set to open in time for the 2008-09 school year.

According to the school's overall plan, once the redevelopment of the Bathurst campus is done, students at Bayview will relocate to Bathurst.

Bayview will then either close or have its status "redefined."

At the meeting, Gales had the difficult task of convincing hundreds of parents and teachers that downsizing from three campuses to two is a logical first step.

"Right now, USDS comprises three campuses serving 1,000 students. At one time, we had 1,400 kids in three campuses. One thousand students cannot work with three campuses. Our population continues to decline and this is consistent with [the experience of] other Toronto Jewish day schools," Gales said.

He said that USDS has about 100 fewer students this year compared to 2003-04 (when it had about 1,100), and the board estimates enrolment will continue to decline, dropping to 887 by next September.

He blamed the drop on many factors, including lower Jewish birth rates, rising tuition – which at USDS hovers at around the standard Jewish day school fee of $10,000 – as well as increased competition and location.

While it's expected that USDS' enrolment will jump back to 1,017 by 2010 as birth rates rise again, Gales said USDS must deal quickly with the same problem that many Toronto Jewish day schools are facing rather than wait for the situation to get worse.

"One of the major challenges at USDS is that two of our campuses are not in the right location. It's not where Jewish populations are growing," he said, referring to the Bayview and Richmond Hill branches.

He cited research conducted by UJA Federation that suggests 70 per cent of people moving into the JTT Vaughan area are Jewish and that until recently, 50 per cent of new USDS students were coming from north of Steeles Avenue, the Toronto-Vaughan border.

The hope, said Gales, is that the Richmond Hill-Bayview merger will save USDS more than $1 million. This, along with the sale of the Richmond Hill campus, will eliminate the school's operating deficit.

He said if the board fails to act now, by the end of 2006, USDS will have a $2.5 million debt. "If we leave status quo and don't touch anything, we will continue to lose $1.7 million more a year."

Anticipating a heated debate, Brian Goldberg, USDS' immediate past president, asked that parents allow each other to make statements and ask questions without interruption.

Anticipating summer

This is the time of year that, for most of us, brings with it a sense of happy anticipation. Summer is just a few days away. The longer days and higher sun lighten our mood. And we think of vacation and the possibilities of frivolity that the weighty winter somehow abjures.

In Israel, however, there is nothing frivolous or light about the particular summer that looms ahead.

"There is a pervasive feeling that this will not be a pleasant summer," Amotz Asa-El, the executive editor of the Jerusalem Post told a luncheon gathering last week in Toronto. "Chances are high that blood will be shed, that Jews will be killing Jews. We don't want to be surprised as we were last decade. But there are extremist circles whose responses could get out of hand."

Asa-El was referring, of course, to the possible responses to Israel's upcoming withdrawal, after Tisha b'Av, from the 21 communities in Gaza and four in the northern West Bank.

The image of Jews forcibly removing other Jews from their homes is a harsh one. And yet, despite the pain, the upcoming withdrawal is supported by the majority mainstream within Israel.

"The disengagement plan," Asa-El said unequivocally, "heralds the re-emergence and restoration of the Israeli – and, I would add, the Jewish consensus." (By "Jewish," I believe he meant the Jews around the world.)

"By the mid-1980s, the internal conflict was tearing Israel apart." The "internal conflict" referred to is the conflict between the two different ideological blocs within Israeli society that emerged after the Six Day War regarding the future of the territories that came under Israel's flag in June 1967, namely the "Land-for-Peace" school and the "Greater Israel" school. Both blocs saw themselves as fulfilling historic Jewish aims: the former, of granting Jewish people peace, and the latter, of returning to the biblical borders of Israel.

"Then we went to Oslo, trying to reshape the Middle East through diplomacy. Israel was prepared to make peace with its neighbours by giving land for peace. The Cold War was over; perhaps it could be done.

"But since then," Asa-El quickly added with the first trace of bitterness, "we have sobered up. The failure of Camp David opened our eyes. Not only did Yasser Arafat not make peace, but he resorted to violence, not only to violence but to violence directed at civilians."

There is no doubt, Asa-El said, the resort to violence by Arafat and the subsequent seeming embrace of that violence by the Palestinian people marked the turning point in the thinking of the large middle within the two ideological blocs.

"A new consensus has emerged in Israel. The moderate middle Israelis drew new conclusions about the adversary," Asa El said. "Peace was not possible with the Arabs in this generation.

"Ariel Sharon has disavowed parts of the 'Greater Israel' stream of thought and is now building a security barrier. He is not deluding Israelis that this approach is Utopia. It is, rather, pragmatic. It is not yet peace, but perhaps it will be a more peaceful life… While we are in for an unpleasant summer, in the longer term we are doing the right thing. Israeli society will emerge through this more humble and more optimistic."

In Toronto as part of a speaking tour of Canada arranged by the Canada-Israel Committee, Asa-El is uniquely qualified to talk about the mainstream majority in Israel. An Israeli-born scholar journalist with advanced degrees in journalism and history from Columbia University and the Hebrew University, he writes a column in the Jerusalem Post called "Middle Israel." He joined the Post in 1995 and has been the paper's business, news and overseas edition editor.

Asa-El was soft-spoken, yet forceful in his observations. He spoke without rancor but with grim determination.

The "extreme" popularity of Hamas among Palestinians, he pointed out, "enhances the view of Middle Israel that no change of heart [among the Palestinians] accompanied Oslo. There has been no educational effort undertaken among Palestinians the way [Anwar] Sadat attempted with his people after 1979.

"The Archimedean balance point [for Israelis] is simply this: what is the attitude toward Israel on the part of the average Palestinian? The damage that the Palestinians inflicted on the minds of Israel was immeasurable by releasing suicide bombers and terrorists to attack Israeli innocents and children."

He believes that Palestinian Authority leader Mahmoud Abbas "squandered his opportunity that arose right after the elections to start the re-education process [of Palestinian society]. He had the momentum right after the election, but he chose not to embark on a new path."

With a steely resolve born of a life defending Israel, Asa-El provided the following perspective on Israel's existential struggle: "Israel's detractors do not realize that their treatment of Israel harkens back to the echoes of the treatment of the 'historic Jew.' Ever since 1967, Israel has been perceived as a military power while its enemies have been perceived as an underdog. But Israelis believe that we are more vulnerable than the other side. Israelis are the historic Jew whose immediate ancestors went through [the European inferno]. We are the historic Jew, but we no longer wander. We are the historic Jew, but we will defend ourselves. We are the historic Jew, but we will no longer be publicly humiliated."

International Caravan to open without Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

More than 50 countries and ethnic communities will be represented at the upcoming International Caravan festival in Toronto, but neither the State of Israel nor the Jewish community will be among them.

Communities from India, Belize, Peru, Cyprus, Mongolia, Tahiti and even "Palestine" are expected to operate pavilions at the festival, alongside more established communities such as Ukraine, Russia, China and the United States. However, the Jerusalem Pavilion, which for many years was mounted by B'nai Brith Canada at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (now the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre) won't be included.

Absence of an Israeli cultural pavilion could mean a lost opportunity to showcase the accomplishments of the Jewish state

"Jerusalem" has not been part of the Caravan celebrations for at least four years, said Jon Witchel, a volunteer organizer who was involved in mounting the pavilion for 19 years. Financial considerations, along with the difficulty in staffing the site and the disruption caused by the renovation of the downtown community centre, put the pavilion in mothballs, he said.

Witchel was asked by Kirk Jensen, president of International Caravan, to head a reconstituted Jerusalem Pavilion, but he said he found the effort too great for a single individual.

Absence of an Israeli cultural pavilion could mean a lost opportunity to showcase the accomplishments of the Jewish state.

A public policy research analysis conducted on behalf of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), in conjunction with the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), concluded that one way to make Israel's case would be to highlight similarities between it and Canada.

Three of the four "important advocacy imperatives" would "put a human face on Israel; demonstrate that Canada and Israel share common values; and... create family-oriented messages that Canadians can relate to," the report stated.

CIJA's website states the organization aims at "providing an informed perspective on our community for all Canadians."

The festival's new format would appear to lend themselves to presenting that message in a family-oriented venue before a mass audience. Jensen said as many as 300,000 people are expected to attend this year's festivities, which run from June 21 to July 4.

For the first time in Caravan's 37-year history, the event will be held in a single location at Downsview Park, as opposed to pavilions scattered across the city. Two hundred thousand square feet of indoor space has been set aside, along with nine acres of land outdoors.

Ya'acov (Cobie) Brosh, Israel's consul general in Toronto, said his office had hoped to participate in Caravan by bringing in cultural entertainment from Israel

In addition to the displays mounted by various cultural communities, visitors will be treated to traditional dance troupes on stage 12 hours a day, with more than 200 flying in from around the world, authentic cuisine in an international food court, an international bazaar, an international art gallery featuring works from 22 countries, a men's soccer tournament, a kids' world entertainment area and a fashion competition.

Ya'acov (Cobie) Brosh, Israel's consul general in Toronto, said his office had hoped to participate in Caravan by bringing in cultural entertainment from Israel, but could not do so because of financial constraints.

"The budget is limited, so regrettably, sometime we have to give up some things.

"We strongly believe that every cultural event we bring from Israel contributes to [showcasing] the other angle of Israel we are proud of and shows the other side of Israel, not just the political, the terror side," he said.

Jensen said sharing others' cultures is the raison d'etre of Caravan.

The beauty of the event is "I get to know your culture," he said.

"If I take the time to learn more about your cultural background, then I get to know you better as a person. Once I have that understanding, we will most likely get along better... Now I can respect our differences, and we can get along as brothers and sisters. In the long run, we will live in a more harmonious and peaceful neighbourhood," he stated.

Despite the proximity of the Caravan launch, Jensen said it was not too late to include the Jerusalem pavilion. "I would embrace that wholeheartedly," he said.

Hungarian survivors may receive $1.5M in aid

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Hungarian Jewish Holocaust survivors in Canada could receive more than $1.5 million (Cdn) in humanitarian aid if a proposed settlement with the United States government is approved later this year.

Canada stands to be allotted six per cent of a $21-million (US) settlement in the so-called Gold Train case, in which Hungarian Holocaust survivors sued the U.S. government for the loss of valuables seized from the Nazis at the end of World War II.

Late last year, the U.S. government agreed to pay $25.5 million in humanitarian aid to Hungarian Jews rather than individual damages. In April, a Florida court gave preliminary approval to the settlement.

The action had been launched in Miami in 2001 on behalf of all Hungarian Jews who claimed losses arising from the seizure of the Gold Train.

According to the suit, the Nazis and their Hungarian collaborators stole thousands of valuables – paintings, jewelry, stamps and coins, Oriental rugs, fine china and glassware, lace, silver and religious items – mostly from Hungarian Jews, and packed them onto a train bound for Germany.

Shortly after the Allied victory in Europe in May 1945, American troops captured the train, consisting of about 24 freight cars, in Austria.

But the lawsuit alleged that the U.S. government never returned the valuables to the Hungarian victims, their survivors or to Hungary. Some of the victims were also from Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia and Romania, parts of which had been been ceded to the fascist Hungarian government.

The action said the loot had been appropriated by the U.S. Army, with some senior officers even taking the choicest goods for themselves.

Between 30,000 and 50,000 Hungarian Jews or their survivors in the United States and other countries might have been eligible to receive a maximum of $10,000 (US) each had the case gone to trial. The original amount sought by the plaintiffs was $300 million.

Instead, the U.S. government agreed to settle the action. In so doing, "the United States denies that it did anything wrong. The settlement is not an admission of wrongdoing or an indication that any law was violated," according to a statement at www.hungariangoldtrain.org.

The settlement includes all those whose personal property was seized or stolen by the Hungarian government, and all heirs or estates.

The agreement will cover basic services, including health care, for Hungarian Jews in the United States, Canada, Hungary, Israel and other countries, based on need.

The six per cent allocated to Canadian agencies is a proposed figure, stressed Hillary Kessler-Godin of the New York-based Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, also known as the Claims Conference.

She told The CJN that a fairness hearing will be held before a judge in late September. The settlement could be finalized soon after that, with the Claims Conference to oversee the distribution of funds in Canada.

Kessler-Godin said a distribution formula for Canadian agencies has not been worked out yet.

There are 2,960 Holocaust survivors of Hungarian descent in this country, according to Judy Cohen, who serves on the executive of Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada and is a Hungarian survivor herself.

Of those, 1,455 live in Toronto, 1,140 in Montreal, 95 each in Vancouver and Ottawa, 65 in Winnipeg, 20 each in Kitchener and Calgary and about 15 in Edmonton.

"It's a lousy settlement but maybe it's the best we can get," Cohen said. "There's no alternative and nobody's going to put up another fight."

Cohen said there's no way of knowing how many of the Hungarian survivors are needy. But an extensive study released last summer showed that one-quarter of Canada's 23,000-plus Holocaust survivors were poor, that over 3,000 were poor and lived alone, and that over 10,000 had one or more disabilities.

In Toronto, three agencies stand to benefit from the Gold Train settlement: Jewish Family & Child Service, the Baycrest Centre and Circle of Care.

Arnold Foss of Circle of Care told The CJN that he has already been asked by the Claims Conference to submit a grant proposal on how the Gold Train funds would be spent by his agency.

The funds would help clients with home services (including housekeeping, cooking and personal care), respite care, kosher meals-on-wheels, transportation, and emergency services, Foss said.

Earlier this spring, Hungarian Holocaust survivors in Canada already receiving war-era compensation were mailed a notice of the proposed settlement. It advised that no action be taken if the recipient wishes to be part of the settlement. But in so doing, the applicant "gives up the right to be part of any other lawsuit against the U.S. government about the Hungarian Gold Train."

To be eligible to benefit, one must have been born before May 8, 1945 and lived in the 1944 borders of Hungary sometime between 1939 and 1945. One must also meet qualifying criteria for "need."

According to hungariangoldtrain.org, "need will be determined based upon criteria similar in nature to those used in that place for existing programs benefiting Nazi victims (e.g., individuals' health, disability and financial situation)."

Some $4.5 million (US) was deducted from the total settlement to pay legal fees, expenses and awards to the named plaintiffs.

The U.S. government has also agreed to set aside $500,000 to fund and create an archive that will document the story of the Gold Train and the looting of Hungary's Jews during the war. Three experts will be chosen to select a museum or research institute to house the archive.

When the case is finally over, the U.S. government says it will an issue a "statement of acknowledgment" about the Gold Train.

New Israel Fund backs Gaza disengagement

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It wouldn't come as much of a surprise to an observer of the Israeli political scene that the New Israel Fund (NIF) has come out foursquare behind the planned disengagement from Gaza. As part of its commitment to supporting the plan which, according to polls, is popular with Israeli voters, NIF has provided grants to a variety of religious Zionist organizations to help smooth the transition to life outside Gaza.

The money is going to groups that comply with NIF's mission – to promote democracy, social justice and respect for the rule of law while fostering dialogue between various political camps in Israel.

Last week, Peter Edelman, president of the NIF board, was in Toronto to meet with the organization's local supporters and to cultivate the next generation of leaders and philanthropists.

Edelman said the NIF, through the approximately $300,000 (US) in grants it allocates every year to 130 recipient organizations, strengthens civil society in Israel. With disengagement looming, NIF is focusing on supporting organizations that back the withdrawal policy while isolating political extremists who have vowed to prevent it.

Among the recipient organizations are settler groups "who are either willing to support the government in this or who are working hard to ensure there is no violence and promote dialogue so settlers feel they can be re-integrated successfully within the Green Line," Edelman said.

Edelman, professor of law at Georgetown University Law Center and former assistant secretary for planning and evaluation during the first Clinton administration, said NIF backs public education programs that support the Gaza disengagement.

While support for the pullout "is broad but not deep," a successful disengagement would be "symbolically...hugely important," he said.

"To say it's strategically not useful for Israel to have these settlements in Gaza, to say these areas should be fundamentally Palestinian, is a step in the right direction," he added.

Examining other aspects of the NIF agenda, Edelman suggested that over the past 10 years, Israel has only a mixed record in addressing issues of human rights and social justice. Progress has been better on questions of human rights, while those on the periphery of economic life have seen their situations worsen. The rate of child poverty in Israel is 30 per cent. "That's a shocking number," he said.

On the human rights front, which can be addressed through court challenges, NIF-supported groups have registered a number of successes in past years. The Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI), at $475,000 (US), NIF's single largest grantee, has won Supreme Court cases that ruled it unlawful to discriminate against Israeli Arabs in the sale of houses. Other victories gave Arab citizens better representation on community administrative councils and more access to early childhood education programs, Edelman said.

NIF also supports Bedouin projects to assist the desert dwellers in the transition from a nomadic life to a more sedentary one. That means helping Bedouins develop the internal governance and advocacy skills to push government authorities to provide infrastructure like water and electricity, he said.

Gesher Theatre celebrated as a positive force

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In an evening of cross-cultural pollination last week, Tel Aviv's Gesher Theatre was lauded as a bridge between Canada and Israel and as a force helping integrate new Russian immigrants into Israeli society.

The event at the Four Seasons Hotel, capped by a lively 30-minute performance by the theatre, was jointly hosted by the Koffler Centre of the Arts and local businessman Leslie Dan and his wife Anna.

Formed by Moscow-born Yevgeny Arye in 1991, the theatre staged two shows in Toronto in Hebrew and Russian.

The first, Shosha, is based on a story set in Warsaw by Isaac Bashevis Singer. The second, City Odessa Stories, featured music and songs from that city dating back to the early 20th century.

Alan Baker, Israel's ambassador to Canada, described the theatre as a link between Israel and Canada.

Yaacov Brosh, Israel's consul general in Toronto, said it exemplifies an important Israeli value, immigrant absorption.

Arye founded it shortly after his arrival in Israel in 1990, recruiting Russian and Israeli actors.

In a videotaped message, Nira Makov, chair of the Friends of the Gesher Theatre Group, spoke of its remarkable successes.

The theatre has put on 90 plays in the past 14 years, from The Idiot to Rosencrantz and Guilderstern are Dead, and toured such cities as Moscow, Riga, London, Berlin, Rome and Dublin to critical acclaim.

Describing culture as a unifying force in Israel, Baker said it brings people together.

Calling Israel's cultural relations with Canada strong, Baker said both nations have many things in common, from a diversity of cultures and languages to a commitment to democracy and the rule of law.

Sarmite Bulte, a Toronto member of Parliament and parliamentary secretary to the minister of Canadian Heritage, Liza Frulla, officially welcomed the theatre to Canada.

A human rights ruse

Last month, the non-governmental organization Amnesty International (AI) released its annual report on the alleged human rights abuses by Israel in its conflict with the Palestinians. The 65-page report, titled Israel and the Occupied Territories – Under the rubble: House demolition and destruction of land and property, was the organization's annual ritual denunciation of the Jewish state.

Among its findings, AI concluded that the demolition and destruction of Palestinian homes are "grave breaches of the Fourth Geneva Convention and are war crimes." Certain other alleged practices by the Israeli army and security services were called crimes against humanity.

The report laments that "the human rights situation in Israel and the Occupied Territories has seriously deteriorated since October 2000. Since then, violence and human right abuses have reached unprecedented levels." As it has consistently done over the years, AI blames Israel for the devastation to the Palestinian economy wrought by the five years of violence. "The Palestinian economy has virtually collapsed, and unemployment and poverty have increased dramatically in the West Bank and Gaza. Two-thirds of the Palestinian population now live below the poverty line, and malnutrition and other medical conditions are spreading."

AI's report is an exercise in political assassination. It aims its guns at Israel but lets the Palestinian terrorists, their accomplices and sponsors fly far below the organization's radar. The Palestinian terrorists live with, hide behind and sadistically exploit the civilian population in whose name they carry on their bloodthirsty, nihilistic struggle against Israel. Even as Israel is preparing to leave the Gaza, Hamas and Islamic Jihad launch rockets, dig their arms smuggling tunnels and shoot at the Jews across the border and continue to send young teenagers packing suicide belts into the Jewish cities. Faced with the same situation, no country on earth would show the equivalent restraint and deference for the maximum saving of innocent life that Israel has. Demolition of homes used by arms smugglers, rocket launchers or bomb makers is a legitimate tactic.

That abuses of Palestinians' human rights by Israelis have occurred over the years, and especially over the past five years, is hardly debatable. Of course they have. All wars evoke such abuses – the war between Israel and the Palestinians, no less. But individual Israeli abuses are, far and away, the exception, not the rule. Moreover, when brought to light, they are rooted out by the Israeli Defence Forces officers in charge and the larger society to which those officers are accountable. In light of the fact that the Palestinian war has been almost exclusively directed at Israeli children and innocent bystanders, it is a wonder that abuses by Israelis have not been far greater in number. Once again, AI has shown itself utterly lacking in balance, proportion, perspective, context and minimal fairness in its accusations against Israel.

Abraham H. Foxman, Anti-Defamation League national director in New York, condemned the AI report as "a gross distortion of reality and counterproductive to efforts to get the Palestinians to halt the violence they initiated. Israeli soldiers are using great restraint in the face of live ammunition and Molotov cocktail-throwing rioters. For Amnesty International to issue a statement of this nature is outrageous and destructive."

We agree.

Canada and Nazi war criminals

Those of us who for many years have pushed the Canadian government to bring Nazi war criminals to justice are not surprised at the poor grade given to Canada by the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Jerusalem ("Canada's efforts on Nazis get poor grade," CJN, May 26).

Former prime minister Pierre Trudeau was always concerned that steps taken against Nazi war criminals, many of whom are from eastern European, would irritate Canada's European population. It was not until Brian Mulroney became prime minister that Canada established the Deschenes Commission, which identified hundreds of potential Nazi war criminals living in Canada. A number of prosecutions were launched, but unfortunately the Supreme Court of Canada in the infamous Finta decision, put an end to criminal prosecutions, leaving the only remedy against war criminals as denaturalization and deportation. Quite a number of cases were launched, but many floundered because the accused were too old and it was difficult to obtain eye witness evidence from elderly survivors in Europe. Any impetus under the Mulroney years soon faded with the election of Jean Chrétien as prime minister. Under his tenure, the political will was lacking, and little or no progress has been made to date. Obviously due to the passage of time, few prosecutions will occur in the future.

The irony of all of this is that much of the financial backing for the federal Liberals comes from affluent Jewish Canadians who fail to use their financial clout to push the justice ministry into more positive action.

Wants to hear the settlers' side

I read Paul Michaels' column "Some truths are hard to hear," (CJN, May 26) and was dismayed by it, especially as he is the communications director for the Canada-Israel committee.

Most of us appreciate the risks associated with being a settler in Judea and Samaria. It is hardly news that the settlers would do what they can to protect themselves and their families and their settlements. Nor is it appropriate for them to be convicted of crimes that they have not been charged with. Nor is it fitting for a spokesperson of the CIC, no less the communications director, to present a case for the Palestinians without so much as a proper response from one settler on this issue.

Again we see here the continuing spectre of Diaspora Jews attacking settlers from the comfort of their North American homes, while the pioneer settlers strive to develop the lands of Israel. It's truly a sad reflection of the lack of support for Israel in the Diaspora.

Muslims and terrorism

Though Consul General Ya'acov (Cobie) Brosh's remarks may have been insensitive to some Muslims, they were hardly original ("Consul's statement of regret doesn't satisfy Muslim groups," CJN, May 19). Shortly after the terrorist attack on a school in North Ossetia, Russia, which killed over 300 people, including more than 150 children, Abd Al-Rahman Al-Rashed, the former editor of the London-based Saudi daily Al-Sharq Al-Awsat, was widely quoted after writing that "obviously not all Muslims are terrorists but, regrettably, the majority of the terrorists in the world are Muslims." An excerpt of his editorial is on the invaluable MEMRI site at http://memri.org/bin/articles.cgi?Page=archives&Area=sd&ID=SP78004. Oddly enough, his remarks were not met with "shock and anger" from Muslim leaders.

Ostentation personified

At first I could not believe what I read in the article "$7.3M Bar Mitzvah" (CJN, May 26). Philip Green should be rebuked for the amounts he paid for his son's bar mitzvah and his own birthday party ($9 million). My concern is why he did not devote these amounts to worthwhile causes – and there are many. The publicity would have been to our benefit – instead of the reverse, adding fuel to the fire of anti-Semitism.

Class reunion in cyberspace

In 1968, I spent a remarkable year in Jerusalem at the Institute for Jewish Youth Leaders from Abroad (Machon Lemadrichei Chutz L'aretz). One hundred and ten Jewish students from all over the world participated in this study-work program. Now, 36 years later, our class is reuniting in cyberspace. We have tracked down more than 80 of our friends but are still looking for others. In particular, we are looking for Marty Solomon, formerly of California, but last heard of living in Toronto. If anyone knows where we can find him, please e-mail merez08@rogers.com. If you were on machon and would like to reunite with your machzor, please contact the machon's alumni association, machonbogrim@jazo.org.il.

Reflections on returning from Poland

By DANA DAVID

Before arriving in Poland as a university participant on the March of the Living, I had several expectations.

I expected to cry all day, every day, for a week. I expected to find the answers to my many questions. I expected to understand the atrocity that occurred only six decades ago. I expected to leave Poland feeling depressed. Prior to leaving Toronto, these expectations seemed realistic to me. While in Poland however, it occurred to me how idealistic they really were.

I did not cry all day, every day. My group landed in Krakow early Wednesday morning and we were driven straight to Auschwitz. I stood by the gate and waited to feel something, but I could not. I tried to evoke emotion by thinking of the people who were there, but I still did not feel anything. More than anything, I felt like I was standing in a photo from a history textbook.

I walked into a large room where the entire length of one wall was a display of human hair. This was hair from the heads of the countless innocent people who were shaved of their dignity. I froze. My heart raced. Millions of thoughts raced through my mind. My legs did not move. Part of me did not want to move, while another part needed to see that this was real and not just another photo from a book. I was in shock. Slowly, I walked the length of the room. I burst into tears. That was the last time I cried for several days. Although I felt deep emotions that were foreign to me over the next few days, I did not cry.

I had been learning about the Holocaust since I was eight years old. I was already aware that this evil took place. I took in as much as I could using all of my senses – not just my eyes. While in Poland, I smelled the air, I listened to the wind, I touched the ground, I tasted the rain and I looked on. I found many ironies. What used to be the Warsaw Ghetto is lovely, and the birds were singing in the Jewish cemetery as I walked through. It is funny how things are not always as they seem. I am still grappling with these feelings. Is it wrong of me to think that what used to be the ghetto is pretty today? Should I not have heard the birds singing while I was in the cemetery?

Many participants in my group had been told to hate the Polish people for what they did. They were told to hate by their grandparents, who witnessed the horrid behaviour of many Poles. I do not blame them for hating. The hatred is not just a reaction to what many Polish people did, but more so for what they did not do. Personally, I feel that hate only hurts the individual who hates, but it is unfair of me to even attempt to even try to imagine how the survivors feel, as I did not suffer the way they did.

It was on the Saturday evening I had a life-altering experience when I met a Polish man named Edmund Masajada. My grandfather, Sam Levinson (Levin), insists that he and his younger brother Alex Levin would not have survived had it not been for the generosity of Edmund's mother, Felicia, who fed them soup on several occasions and gave them scissors and matches.

My grandfather and great-uncle had run away from their town Rokitno and were living in the forest of what is now the Ukraine for a year and a half. My grandfather vows, to this day, that he would not be here if it were not for the soup that Felicia fed him. Three years ago, Sam and Alex arranged for Edmund's mother to be designated Righteous Among The Nations by Yad Vashem.

Edmund addressed my group and talked about how he feels regarding what happened more than 60 years ago. I walked into the room and was brought directly to him. I looked into his eyes and realized, only then, that I would not be standing there had it not been for the courage and humanity his family displayed during the war. That is when I cried again. Only this time it was not because of sadness, but rather because of joy. It was an overwhelming feeling. I do not know of words to explain how I felt at that moment. My first cousin, Ashley Levinson, was also fortunate to be a participant on the trip with me, and I feel so lucky that we were able to share that special moment.

Edmund said his mother was not only murdered by the Ukrainian police who caught her, but tortured as well. He lost his mother as a young teenager. He does not blame the men for whom she lost her life. He blames the people who killed her – he blames the Nazis. After spending several days learning of the appalling things that happened in Poland during the Holocaust, it was heart-warming to hear about a woman who risked her own life to save the lives of others. There was not a dry eye in the room.

I gave Edmund a gift from my family – a pen with the engraving "we will always remember." I started crying again as I thanked Edmund, and told him in front of the people in the room that he and his mother are heroes and will always be in my heart. He hugged me and in broken English said, "No cry."

Edmund came with us to the Havdalah ceremony with all 1,000 March of the Living participants from Canada. Edmund's mother was recognized as Righteous Among The Nations and he addressed the auditorium. He said it is our duty to make sure that such a horrible event never happens again. The ceremony was wonderful and involved a lot of singing and dancing.

Edmund turned to me at one point and said that he wishes his mother could have seen how much spirit and energy the Jewish youth have. He told me that his mother would have loved being there. Edmund reminded me of the many people in the world who mean well, appreciate life and want to make the world a better place.

Before heading to the airport on Sunday evening my group had a ceremony on the Umschlagplatz – the platform where many Jews were rounded up and put onto trains to be murdered. We stood in a circle and one at a time we lit candles and shared with the group what and whom we would bring to Israel if we could bring anything or anyone. I explained that I would have brought Felicia Masajada with me, so that she could experience the strength and bond of the Jewish people in the State of Israel.

As for the expectation I had before I arrived in Poland – that I would cry all day, every day, for a week – I cried only twice, and at the most disgusting sight I had ever seen and at the most wonderful experience I have ever had in my lifetime.

Not only did I not find the answers to all my questions, I came home with many more questions. I have come to believe that these questions will never be answered and I will only have more over the course of time.

I do not understand what happened during the Holocaust. I have learned that it is important to make the distinction between understanding how it happened as opposed to what happened. I understand how it happened and I know what happened, only I will never understand what happened.

I did not leave Poland feeling depressed. I left Poland with hope and with a mission. I have vowed to do what I can to make sure the Holocaust does not happen again. Hate and anti-Semitism were the roots of this atrocious event. It is our duty to address these issues and to take preventative measures, as clearly another Holocaust is always possible. We can never be too comfortable or else we let our guard fall. It is our duty to keep the Jewish people strong and united, and fight for the State of Israel.

My next point I direct at the younger generation: we are the last generation to know survivors of the Holocaust. One day we are going to be the elder generation telling of our grandparents' courage and the horrors they were subjected to. We have a responsibility – to become educated, to educate as many people as possible and to never forget.

I have taken a vow: I will continue to become educated about the Holocaust, I will continue to share my knowledge with others, and I will always remember. I hope others will join me in my mission.

Life is no dream

I have walked past the sign on the church grounds many times. It read: "Live the Dream." It troubled me. What utter nonsense! Dreams are flights of fantasy, composed of the improbable, if not the impossible. Life is to be lived in real time, planned with rational faculties and functional practicalities. To confuse the two is to frustrate life, not enhance it. To misappropriate dreams is to lose a precious diversion that enriches life.

Narma Bammel Joseph in Montreal

Dreams are important. They are necessary to our lives from every perspective. We know that without a sufficient dream sequence during sleep, humans cannot survive and might even lose their sanity. Somehow, the brain needs this playful intermission.

But that time-out can't be considered constructive life planning. Dreams can be frightening or funny, filled with fantastic images or memorable experiences. They mix things up, remove or replace contexts and, in general, make no sense. They cannot be lived. To have any impact on our lives, they must be interpreted, translated and understood in real time. They should not be reduced to goals or ideals or plans.

In biblical fashion, dreams that we remember bring all sorts of messages to us – important messages. They led Joseph to understand and predict future human interactions. They also got him into trouble. Whether we see dreams as messages from God or as containing clues about the future, they are also a gift from God that we can't survive without. Dreams have always been seen as important. But the role given to dreams depends on our cultural understanding and expectations.

Freud was not the only one to impress upon us the value of dream sequences and dream interpretation. In a post-Freudian world, we should be sophisticated in our appeal to dreams and in our assessment of their value. Clearly, psychological hints and clues are embedded in dreams. A wise counselor can help us focus on problems and solutions based on dream evidence. But to rely on dreams for factuality or for life's blueprints is to misappropriate this faculty.

More significantly, this symbolizes a confusion of assets in our culture. It loses sight of the wonderful world of fantasy and makes it subservient to a utilitarian function.

Must our dreams be livable? What place imagination? Flights of fantasy are the essential character of dreams. To dream is to leave the space-time continuum of our daily lives and explore the impossible. To dream the impossible dream! Now that is an expression worth repeating. Dreams should be just that: illusions that occupy our sleeping time, that give our brains and spirits an escape from reality.

Life must be lived on a different plane, enriched by imagination and fantasy, but not equated to, or replaced by, either.

Benedict carries forward John Paul's damaging legacy

It's true that the late pope visited Israel in 2000 and was very open about the Church's responsibilities for anti-Semitism in its teachings about Jews and Judaism. I don't denigrate this supposed sea change in Catholic doctrine. I'm just not sure I believe it, and I think it's important to recognize some of the less attractive legacies he has left and that his successor will carry forward.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

John Paul was an actor who projected kindness, caring and compassion for his flock. He could work a crowd of seniors or a swarm of teenagers anxious for spiritual growth. In Poland, he was an icon of resistance to Communism, and his ruling that Jewish children after the Holocaust should be returned to their Jewish families wherever possible rescued many for Judaism.

But his papacy will be judged on the direction he set for the Catholic Church, and not on tiny windows he opened toward the Jews.

He adamantly opposed the use of condoms to protect against AIDS. While I don't know how many Catholics in Africa – where this issue hits home the hardest – listened to his admonitions, his refusal dooms his papacy to moral failure. When a whole continent is drowning, you don't pull up the lifeboats and sail away.

John Paul, like Pius XII, sought tight control of doctrine by the Vatican. That may not mean much to CJN readers, but let me put it this way: suppose the chief Ashkenazi rabbi of Israel radiated such power that every single Orthodox rabbi in the world had to adhere to his rulings, preach only the sermons he approved of, and in yeshivas accept only his point of view as Torah mi'Sinai. Whereas our tradition (and liberal Catholic tradition) allows for a dialogue in halachic discourse, both John Paul and the now Pope Benedict XVI drove the church down a narrow highway to doctrinal truth.

This has helped bring down the curtain on social change in Latin American countries, where priests had stood against evil and bloodthirsty dictatorships in that part of the world. It also means that theologians who dare to disagree with Vatican pronouncements were and will be removed or silenced in their efforts to teach non-conforming Catholic theology – never mind that the issues of married priests or the ordination of women have been stored firmly away for another century or so.

John Paul did not seem to comprehend the damage done by pedophile priests and their protectors, nor does Benedict seem interested in this issue. When Cardinal Law of Boston celebrated mass at John Paul's funeral, who did not shudder at the great harm Law had done by burying the wickedness of his parish priests? Yet, he has been promoted, not punished.

John Paul also refused to open the archives on the papacy of Pius XII concerning his relationships with the Nazis. Clearly Pius XII felt that tight control of Germany's churches was more vital to protecting his reign than any Christian duty to protest Hitler's genocidal policies. His silence gave consent. And yet John Paul hurried to beatify Pius XII, a drive to sainthood the new pope is unlikely to challenge.

Why should we care?

John Paul may have kissed the Western Wall and blessed the Jewish people, but he was less comforting to those of his own people in danger of disease, oppression and abuse. It's not about us, but about the Catholic Church that we should worry.

Not least of all, Benedict bodes ill for Catholics seeking more enlightened Vatican policy. I can't echo the many Jewish leaders who have hailed his appointment, because Benedict, simply put, does not believe that Jews merit salvation until they convert.

Benedict, the doctrinaire and narrow man that he is, leaves no room for the Other in his philosophy, so where in that worldview will we, the ultimate "Other," exist? There has never been a place for us in totalitarian structures – we thrive in democracies, where we are part of the whole, rather than people forced to wear the badge of shame.

But really, does it matter if the Pope likes Jews or not? He should be seeking the good of all his people, and speaking peace to them. Our turn can wait.

Ending violence in the name of God

Daily news reports starkly remind us of a troubling and destructive phenomenon. We witness the modern scourge of the mass murderers that are politely referred to as suicide bombers operating in the Middle East and elsewhere, as well as bombings in Indonesia in a Muslim-Christian dispute and other acts of violence that shatter the lives of innocent people.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Whatever form the violence takes, there is one common denominator: these acts are taking place in the name of religion, for the sake of religion – or, put succinctly, in the name of God.

In today's world, using violence to further religious objectives is largely limited to extremist factions of various religions. But it is sufficiently present worldwide to pose a serious threat to international peace and stability, and it promotes hostility and injustice toward too many people.

We have witnessed the impact of religious violence in Afghanistan, Pakistan, Iraq, Iran and elsewhere in that region, and we see its threat to overall world peace.

Violence, of course, is not limited to killing, wounding and maiming. There are less physical manifestations of violence, including harassment and threats, the espousing of hatred and violence and, of course, the oppression and abuse of women – all in the name of an organized religion. In Canada, the recent advocacy in an Ottawa Islamic school of violence against Jews is an example that is frighteningly close to home.

To be sure, this is not a new issue. One can harken back to biblical times, to the eras of the Inquisition and Crusades and the Salem witch hunts for a few of the many historic examples of God's name or God's intent being used as an excuse for violence and oppression.

Most, if not all, religions espouse the belief that there is a loving, compassionate and caring deity. So how do we explain the horrific acts of violence that are being carried out to further religious causes?

Many theologians and religious leaders have addressed this question and tried to provide an explanation, but there are no easy answers.

Some recent examples of thoughtful analyses on the role of religion in society, generally, and on the theme of violence in the name of God include works such as History of God: The 4000-Year Quest of Judaism, Christianity and Islam and Holy War: The Crusades and Their Impact on Today's World by Karen Armstrong, A Fury for God: The Islamist Attack on America by Malise Ruthven and A Problem for Hell: America and the Age of Genocide by Samantha Power.

The John Humphrey Centre for Peace and Human Rights is an Edmonton-based national organization named after the late Prof. John Humphrey of McGill University, the Canadian co-author of the 1948 United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The centre is currently planning an international conference, on the topic of "Violence in the Name of God: A Challenge to World Peace" to be held in Edmonton in October 2006. This conference is being chaired by former senator Douglas Roche, a well-respected theologian and human rights advocate, and will attempt to address the issue of violence as a major challenge to religions.

About two years ago, the UN did convene a similar meeting (organized largely by media mogul Ted Turner) and, it appears, no tangible results materialized.

One may not expect a miracle from the upcoming Edmonton conference, but it's certainly worth the effort to continue to explore this important issue and its pervasive consequences.

What is also important is to ensure that discussions among religious leaders not simply result in a comfortable, ecumenical-style, interfaith experience but rather that they squarely address the hard issues of violence, hatred and killing in the name of God. That is the challenge before us.

Organized religion must face the question that acts of killing and other forms of violence are being carried out in the name of supreme powers that are properly and normally associated with peace, justice, love and human rights.

Rather than associating religion with violence, the two concepts ought to be mutually exclusive. Religious doctrine and practice, in our "enlightened" world, should be free of hatred and violence.

The Kirshner File

Germany struggles with its Nazi past

Sixty years after Adolf Hitler blew his brains out in a Berlin bunker and Germany surrendered unconditionally to the Allies in World War II, Germans are still grappling with the protracted, painful process of coming to terms with their past.

Sheldon Kirshner in Berlin

Yet they are doing it better than anyone else. Japan still refuses to acknowledge the enormity of the atrocities it committed in China, while China tiptoes around the crimes of fanatic Maoists during the Cultural Revolution. Italy has not fully faced up to the fascist period and France has only begun to look fearlessly at the Vichy era. Until quite recently, Romania steadfastly denied Jews had been murdered on its soil during the Holocaust and for decades, Austrians insisted they were merely victims of Nazism rather than also willing collaborators.

Germany, however, has not flinched from its historical responsibilities.

Successive German chancellors, beginning with the conservative Konrad Adenauer and extending to his current social democratic successor Gerhard Schroeder, have vowed to keep alive the memory of the Nazi genocide.

More recently, in light of a 1985 landmark speech in which then-German president Richard von Weizsacker warned his nation that "anyone who closes his eyes to the past is blind to the present," Germany's elite has pledged to incorporate Nazi crimes into its national identity.

On a practical level, Germany has tried to repent by funnelling billions of dollars of restitution payments to Holocaust survivors, fighting neo-Nazism and seeking a Europe-wide ban on Nazi insignia, encouraging the growth of a new Jewish community in Germany, forging a strong relationship with Israel, preserving former concentration camps such as Dachau and Buchenwald and building an array of sombre monuments dedicated to the Jewish victims of National Socialism. The Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe, which was opened in Berlin last month after years of passionate debate regarding its size and form, is but the latest concrete expression of remembrance and Germany's first national Holocaust monument.

That there are Germans who complain of Holocaust fatigue, of the kind archly described by prominent writer Martin Walser in the late 1990s, is beyond doubt. Micha Brumlik, the director of the Fritz Bauer Institut in Frankfurt, which studies the impact of the Holocaust on German society, said that more 50 per cent or Germans no longer wish to be reminded of the 12-year interregnum that tarnished their country's honour and integrity.

This phenomenon goes hand in hand with clever but transparent attempts to "relativize" the Holocaust and, by implication, to wipe the slate clean. Last year, Martin Hohmann, a parliamentarian from the Christian Democratic Union party, claimed there is no essential difference between the horrors perpetrated by Jewish communists during the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution and the horrors carried out by the Nazis after 1933. Hohmann's analogy brought to mind the so-called "historians' debate," which roiled Germany in the 1980s. The basic but subliminally subversive question it raised was whether the crimes of the Nazis were indeed unique and whether they were comparable to Stalin's reign of terror or the slaughter of the Armenians.

Nevertheless, judging by a survey published in a recent edition of the newsmagazine Der Spiegel, a plurality of Germans believe that, due to Hitler's anti-Semitic policies, they bear a special responsibility toward Jews.

For approximately the first 10 years after the war, western Germany – notwithstanding its decision to compensate Jews for their suffering, to prosecute some Nazi war criminals and to dabble in de-Nazification – did not seriously deal with what was commonly referred to as the "unresolved past." By contrast, the Communist regime in eastern Germany, which collapsed with the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989, exploited the Nazi epoch within the context of Cold War tensions.

In a new book published by Harvard University Press, Beyond Justice, author Rebecca Wittmann, a University of Toronto historian, argues that Adenauer's priorities were economic recovery and political democratization rather than a judicial confrontation with the Nazi legacy.

Repression gave way to full-throated debate in the late 1950s. German students in Karlsruhe, the seat of the Supreme Court, mounted an accusative exhibition on the complicit judiciary during Nazi times. The Diary of Anne Frank galvanized an angry, questioning generation. Public figures ranging from novelist Gunter Grass to student leader Joschka Fischer, now Germany's foreign minister, demanded a frank accounting.

According to Wittmann, Germany's first difficult confrontation with its past coincided with the 1963 Frankfurt trial of 20 former Auschwitz guards. The trial and execution of Nazi functionary Adolf Eichmann, plus the Six Day War, were also events of lasting importance in consciousness raising.

In 1968, a university student named Beate Klarsfeld caused a sensation by slapping Georg Kiessinger, the German chancellor who had been a member of the Nazi party. Two years later, his successor, Willy Brandt, raised eyebrows by kneeling at the Warsaw ghetto memorial in Warsaw. The 1979 U.S. television miniseries Holocaust left a deep impression, as did Steven Spielberg's 1993 award-winning film Schindler's List.

As a result of these developments, Germany is intensely and resolutely conscious of its historical obligations, probably far more so than any other country, save for Israel.

Last month, as I was strolling down Berlin's Unter den Linden on an unseasonably cold morning, I caught sight of a blue banner draped on a grey building on the campus of Humboldt University. It read: "We thank the Allies for liberating us from the Nazi dictatorship." Across the road, at Babel Platz, opposite the faculty of law, there was a plaque attesting to Nazi book burning. Nearby, strung on a wrought-iron gate, was a sign: "Sixty years since the end of the war. What have we learned?"

While exploring a gentrified corner of eastern Berlin known as the Hackische Hoefe, I literally walked on several small commemorative brass plates fixed flush with the pavement. The work of Cologne-based artist Gunter Demnig, they memorialize German Jews deported and murdered by the Nazis. By all accounts, there are 3,000 such stolpersteine throughout Germany.

Although Germany has compensated Jewish property owners for their losses, new cases pop up periodically.

Last year, the descendants of the Wertheim family, which lost its department store fortune under Nazi Aryanization laws, won a pivotal court battle that sets the stage for further legal wrangling. Four months ago, in a parallel case, a judge in Berlin ruled that a Jewish woman who had been forced to flee Germany was entitled to be compensated for furnishings in a medical clinic expropriated from her late parents.

Similarly, reparation payments are a jolting reminder of former days.

Last month, after talks with the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, the German government announced it would compensate Jews who had been incarcerated in North African labour camps for at least six months. Vichy France, an ally of Germany, established some 30 camps in Morocco and Algeria in 1941 and 1942. When Germany occupied Tunisia in 1942 and 1943, 32 camps were set up.

In the wake of this announcement, Germany agreed to add an additional payment of $11 million (US) to meet the home care needs of survivors in 17 countries.

Most Germans who personally or administratively killed Jews during the Holocaust have passed on. But occasionally, newly found perpetrators, all in their 80s and 90s, are arrested, thus reminding Germans of their ever-present past. Nearly a year ago, an unidentified man was taken into custody in Munich, charged with having organized a massacre of Czech partisans and civilians. In Gottingen, meanwhile, prosecutors opened an investigation against a former SS officer, identified only as Hans F., who participated in the mass shootings of Jews in Ukraine.

Since 1945, 100,000 or so German citizens have been investigated for participation in war crimes, but only 6,487 have been convicted. Of these, 13 were executed, 163 sentenced to life imprisonment, 6,197 given temporary prison terms and 114 subjected to fines.

Not surprisingly, the past is also an issue in Germany's foreign ministry. In March, after Fischer banned posthumous tributes in the ministry's in-house magazine for diplomats who had been Nazi party members, he created a commission to study the matter.

Clearly, the spectre of the Third Reich continues to haunt Germany.

Thailand's chief rabbi pays visit to Toronto

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Josef Chaim Kantor never fails to get laughs when he quips that he's the chief rabbi of 60 million people, "but only several hundred are Jewish."

As chief rabbi of Thailand, a post he's held since 1993, Rabbi Kantor presides over a vibrant Jewish community whose roots go back several hundred years. He also caters to the spiritual and practical needs of the 100,000 or so Jews passing through every year – businesspeople, Jewish travellers and young Israeli backpackers drawn to the nation's popular tourist resorts.

Rabbi Joseph Chaim Kantor

There are five El Al flights to and from Israel each week, bringing thousands of young trekkers in between army duty and careers. "It's exotic and cheap," Rabbi Kantor explains. "From there, they can go to Laos and Vietnam."

Do people do a double take when he reveals his job title? "Only customs," he told The CJN in an interview. "They always stop me and put me through rigorous checks. They figure I must be up to some mischief."

In a country that is 95 per cent Buddhist, Rabbi Kantor and his flock of about 250 permanent Jewish residents – mainly Israelis, Americans and Britons living in the capital, Bangkok – are considered an unknown quantity.

For example, when he goes out in Bangkok, many locals either consider him a Muslim or "have no clue. When they ask me, I explain that I'm from the religion of Israel and I'm an American citizen. Sometimes they understand. More often than not, they don't."

Anti-Semitism, thus, is virtually non-existent. And the government deals forcefully with Muslim insurgents in the country's south. Relations with Israel are normal.

The 36-year-old New York-born Chabad rabbi oversees the activities of three other rabbis in Bangkok, one in Chiang Mai in the north, and one in Surattani in the south. His staff includes 10 visiting yeshiva students. Chabad also recently opened an office on the resort island of Phuket.

As well, Rabbi Kantor leads services in Bangkok's three synagogues, looks in on the daily pre-school classes for young children and supervises kashrut at the restaurants and bakeries in all three Chabad houses (to boot, he doubles as a shochet by ritually slaughtering chickens.)

For Israelis especially, a big attraction are the drop-in centres Chabad runs, where travellers have access to free Internet and telephone service and kosher snacks.

The hubbub is another sign of the success Chabad has encountered in exotic locales. In the Nepalese capital of Katmandu, for example, Chabad annually hosts the world's largest seder.

In Bangkok, this year's Passover seder drew 1,800 people. Over 2,000 worshippers turned out for Rosh Hashanah services last autumn.

"I'm very busy," understates Rabbi Kantor, five of whose six children were born in Thailand.

But not nearly as busy as he was last December when southeast Asia's tsunami struck, killing between 7,000 and 8,000 people in Thailand alone.

Rabbi Kantor set up a command post in Bangkok and spent a sleepless week co-ordinating the frantic rescue and recovery efforts. In the hardest hit areas, which included Phuket, "there were bloated bodies in the street, dazed people walking around. The smell of death was in the air. It was confusion, bedlam," he recalls.

"But we hit the ground running. We sent some of our guys to hospital. Others were in charge of contacting survivors. The people most attracted to us were Israelis but we helped anybody who needed help, Jews and non-Jews."

In all, nine Israelis and several Jewish tourists were killed in the disaster.

Rabbi Kantor also worked closely with the Israeli response team, which included experts trained in the grisly task of body identification.

When will his exotic posting come to a end? "When Moshiach comes," he smiles.

Rabbi Kantor was in Toronto as guest speaker at the second annual Spirit of Community Dinner sponsored by the Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre in Thornhill. This year's theme was "In the Merit of Brotherhood."

Over 1,000 people packed the Renaissance Parque Centre for the lavish event, where three supporters were honoured. Rabbi Pinchas Tessler, an educator, received the Guardian of Heritage Award. The Honour of Brotherhood Award was given to community leader and philanthropist Mario Cortellucci. And Rabbi Yisroel Landa, executive director of the Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre, presented entrepreneur Ami Tamam with the Award of Patronage.

Greetings came from Vaughan Mayor Michael Di Biase, York Region Chair Bill Fisch, and dinner co-chair Mario Racco, Liberal MPP for Thornhill.
